War to last months

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The war against Iraq probably will last months, not weeks, and will entail enemy victories before Saddam Hussein is defeated, the White House said Thursday.

The somber appraisal was combined with a confident prediction that in the final analysis, the United States will prevail.

Eight days into the war, Republican leaders of Congress were briefed on the fighting by President Bush and Defense Secretary Dick Cheney.

"It's not going to be a short war," said House Republican Leader Bob Michel of Illinois. "We're not going to be rushing into a land war while the air strikes still have much to accomplish."

Rep. Newt Gingrich, the GOP House whip from Georgia, said Saddam was a dangerous opponent and that the war would be a long, difficult undertaking.

"There are going to be enemy victories, there are going to be enemy surprises, and days when we see allied losses," Presidential Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater said.

"We need to get into a frame of mind that allows us to accept those reverses and surges and still keep track of the main thrust and our conviction that we will win," Fitzwater said.

With Iraqi forces hunkered down and refusing to come out fighting, allied casualties have been kept low. That could change dramatically if the war moves from the air to a fierce battle on the ground between infantry, armored and artillery forces.

"We would prefer not to talk in terms of days or weeks but months because we think the people need to be prepared for the idea that this is not a short war," Fitzwater said. "But we don't know how long it's going to last."

In other developments: The Army said it was calling 8,478 more reservists and National Guard members to active duty from units in 22 states, Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia. More than 190,000 have been called up since U.S. troops were sent to the gulf last August.

The Senate voted 99-0 in favor of tax relief for troops in the gulf. The measure, already approved by the House, allows the troops to delay filing their 1990 tax returns until they have been out of the combat zone for six months.

Agriculture Secretary Clayton Yeutter, Bush's choice to become chairman of the Republican National Committee, created a uproar when he suggested Democrats who opposed authorizing use of force in the gulf would suffer politically.

Bush ignored reporters' questions about Yeutter's remarks, and Yeutter himself said, "You need a little more precision on what Mr. Yeutter said."

Supply of blood abundant despite Persian Gulf crisis

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

Although war has broken out in the Middle East, the need for blood has not been a big problem.

In fact, Colleen Wooley, director of communication for the Red Cross in Wichita, said the Red Cross is reducing the amount of blood it is sending to the gulf.

"The American Red Cross, in cooperation with the U.S. military, has scaled back its blood shipment to the Persian Gulf from 1,000 units per week to 400 units per week," Wooley said.

Since blood only lasts 42 days, the military is trying to avoid an overabundant supply. Blood that is frozen, however, can last up to 10 years, said K-State Bloodmobile Coordinator Cindy Burke.

Patsy Ayers, blood bank supervisor at Irwin Army Hospital at Fort Riley, said the gulf war has kept blood banks busy.

"It's had a big impact on our work here at the hospital," she said. "Work

Dole says early end unlikely in gulf war

Sen. Bob Dole praised the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Thursday evening for their unwavering support of the Big Red One, but cautioned them to not expect the Fort Riley troops home anytime soon.

"I wish I could be standing here tonight saying it's over," he said. "I wish I could be standing here saying there would be no more American casualties. I wish I could be saying it would last maybe another week. But that's probably not going to be the case."

Dole spoke about the Persian Gulf War at the Holidome for the Chamber's 73rd Annual Meeting.

The allied strike force has done an exceptional job, Dole said, but he did not want troops from the 1st Infantry Division seeing any action until it was absolutely necessary.

"I don't want to commit ground forces until every other resource and every other option has been explored to the fullest," he said. "I don't want to read about any casualties in the Big Red One."

Dole said the role of world policeman has fallen on the shoulders of America, like it or not — but, hopefully, a peaceful solution and an era of stability in the Middle East would be ushered in once the war ends.

"We're not mercenaries," he said. "We're not fighting the war for someone else's money. We don't want all this authority and power, but we're the only real superpower left. Everybody's going to look at us to provide the leadership."

Leadership that will bring about a solution to the Palestine question, Dole said. Leadership that will somehow get the Arabs and the Israelis to sit down together and decide it's time to stop killing one another.

But those problems cannot and will not be solved until the war in the gulf is over and Saddam Hussein is dealt with, Dole said, and right now it's impossible to deal with him.

"It's pretty hard to tell with one visit what kind of person anyone is," Dole said of his April 1990 visit with Saddam. "But someone who will parade prisoners of war before the TV cameras immediately after they've been captured — when they're in a dazed condition, a state of shock, or been injured. Someone who'll coerce them to make statements, I think indicates and demonstrates and underscores that President Bush is right. That the coalition is right."

"I look back on some of the debates over these high-tech missiles over the past 10 years and being almost run out of town by the liberals who said 'you're wasting all this money for all these high-tech weapons you're never going to use,'" he said. "Well, what would you pay for a Patriot missile now?"

While voting on funding for Patriot missiles is one thing, voting to go to war is another.

"There's always a little doubt — Did you do the right thing when you voted 'yes'?" Dole said he had asked himself. "I'm not sure yet. It's not quite as clear as I'd like it to be."

Soviet troops fire on Lithuanian vehicles

Accusations fly as officials sort out stories

By the Associated Press

VILNIUS, U.S.S.R. — Lithuanian officials said Thursday that Soviet troops accompanying a column of armored cars opened fire on two vehicles outside of Vilnius.

Ceslavus Stankavicius, a deputy to Lithuanian President Vytautas Landsbergis, told a news conference the Soviet soldiers were apparently annoyed by a police car and government vehicle following their armored cars on the main road from Vilnius to the republic's second city, Kaunas.

Stankavicius said one person was wounded in Thursday's incident, but officials did not yet know how seriously. Another person was arrested by the soldiers, he said. No other details were available.

In Moscow, reformers in the legislature of the Russian republic failed to win approval of a resolution condemning military attacks in the Baltic republics.

Landsbergis accused Soviet troops of kidnapping two draft-age students, and condemned the military occupation of two buildings on Wednesday.

Lithuanian officials said they contacted Georgy Tarazevich, the personal representative of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, about Thursday's shooting.

"These events can only be labelled as the continued license of the Soviet Armed Forces to operate despite promises that this would be discontinued," Landsbergis told Lithuania's parliament. Gorbachev said Tuesday there would be no more military assaults against separatists in the Baltics.

In Moscow, the Russian legislature voted 117-51 in favor of a resolution condemning what it called unconstitutional acts of military force against the civilian population. But the measure failed because it did not gain a majority in the 250-member body.

The resolution asked national legislators to consider criminal proceedings against those responsible for Soviet troop attacks and barred the formation in Russia of illegal structures like the shadowy National Salvation Committees in the Baltic Republics.

Grad checks help students meet requirements

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Responsibility for meeting class-load requirements for graduation ultimately fall on the student. Most colleges, however, provide students with graduation checks to inform them of what graduation requirements are still needed.

Graduation checks are usually done after the student has completed at least 80 hours.

Generally, each college will wait until a copy of the student's transcript is received from the Registrar's office.

"Someone then sits down and compares the transfer and K-State courses to the requirements needed to fulfill their major," said Michael Perl, director of student and professional services in the College of Education.

Perl said the student then receives a copy of the courses they have left to complete. He also said the classes the student is currently enrolled in are included on the list of remaining classes because many end up dropping at least one class.

The College of Architecture and Design and the College of Engineering take a more direct approach to the graduation check by talking with each senior individually about the classes they have yet to take.

"It is very time consuming, but every student goes out of here smiling. With the interview, we can go over their transcript thoroughly. By the time they leave, they and I agree with what classes that they have left to take. I think it is more effective than the student simply receiving a piece of paper," said Bill Jahnke, associate dean of the College of Architecture, who was the first to develop this system.

King week good, bad

Organizers see mixed results toward end of celebration

KELLY BERG
Campus Editor

Martin Luther King Jr. Week is coming to a close, and many don't even know it ever started.

While organizers of the week's events are pleased that attendance was higher at several events this year than last year, they are disappointed in the overall number of participants in the week of activities.

"Too many people think of it as a black thing, only for black people," said Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life and Martin Luther King Jr. Recognition Week Committee member. "But Martin Luther King talked about peace for everyone — not just the blacks. His message is no longer relevant to just blacks."

Verly Switzer, director of academics and committee chairman, also said he was disappointed with the lack of non-black student participation. "Some people still seem to think that this program is for minority students only," Switzer said. "I think this is why we don't see a high number of white students at most of the events."

Both Franklin and Switzer said lack of coverage in the Collegian was a contributing factor to the lower number of participants in the various activities.

"We had hoped the Collegian would help us present the week as a campus-wide observance," Franklin said. "You need a vehicle like the newspaper to get the news of the events out to the people."

He said he was very pleased with the community support, which he attributed to daily coverage of the week's activities in the Manhattan Mercury, but was disappointed in student involvement, which he partially attributed to the Collegian's more sporadic coverage of the events.

Franklin said another way the committee tried to get more students — both black and non-black — to participate was to add several students to the committee in November.

"When I joined the committee in November," Franklin said, "most of the other members were faculty and staff. I suggested adding about 20 more students to the committee."

He said the committee tried to pick key white respected student leaders to be on the committee. This included representatives from the student government, residence halls and the Greek system.

"We wanted people that could help us get the word out to as many people as possible," Franklin said.

Switzer and Franklin said, although they were a little disappointed in the turnout for the events overall, they were rather pleased with the attendance at several of

Japan offers additional gulf funds

TOKYO (AP) — Prime Minister Toshiki Kaifu announced Thursday that Japan will give an additional $9 billion to the allied forces in the Persian Gulf.

Kaifu informed President Bush of Japan's decision in a 13-minute telephone conversation. Bush thanked Kaifu on behalf of the allied nations for the contribution, according to a Japanese transcript of the conversation.

Tokyo, which imports 70 percent of its oil from the Middle East, has been under increasing U.S. pressure to provide additional aid to the war effort. But it also faces strong opposition from Japanese opposed to the war, or to paying higher taxes to finance the contribution.

Utah House approves abortion bill

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — The Utah House of Representatives Thursday approved an amended version of an anti-abortion bill that raced through the legislative process this week, stripping it of its most restrictive elements.

The House voted 41-31 in favor of the amended measure, sending it to the Senate. State senators passed the tougher version Wednesday on a vote of 23-5.

Barring major changes, Gov. Norm Bangerter said he would sign either version of the measure, said his press secretary, Francine Giani.

1990 census viewed as inaccurate

WASHINGTON (AP) — The National League of Cities said three-fourths of the nation's municipal leaders believe the 1990 census was inaccurate.

New York City grew by nearly 4 percent in the 1980s while other large cities in the East and Midwest shrank during the decade, the Census Bureau said Thursday.

These are the final numbers of a national count that began when Americans were asked to fill out and mail a form accounting for themselves. Later, census workers canvassed housing projects and homeless shelters looking for people who never got, or didn't return, a form.

State court upholds death penalty

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — The New Jersey Supreme Court upheld the death penalty Thursday for a businessman whose conviction for arranging the murder of his wife was the subject of a best-selling book and TV movie.

The ruling marks the first time the state's highest court has backed the death penalty since New Jersey reinstated capital punishment in 1982.

The court reversed 27 previous death sentences.

The decision upholding Robert Marshall's death sentence stunned his lawyers, who vowed to appeal in federal court.

Joseph McGinniss chronicled Marshall's case in his best-selling book "Blind Faith," published in 1989. Marshall, who maintains his innocence, also was the subject of an NBC mini-series in February 1990.

Marshall, 50, was convicted and sentenced to death by lethal injection for hiring three Louisiana men to murder his wife, Maria, so he could collect $1.5 million in life insurance and continue an extramarital affair with Sarann Kraushaar, a former school administrator who later testified against him.

Judge refuses Copeland guilty plea

ROLLA, Mo. (AP) — Death sentences are still an option for an elderly Missouri farmer and his wife for the slaying of five transient farm workers, a judge said Thursday after refusing to accept a plea agreement.

Judge E. Richard Webber refused to accept a deal in Phelps County Circuit Court to spare Ray Copeland, 76, from facing the death penalty. He scheduled jury selection in the case Friday.

The agreement also would have saved Copeland's wife, Faye, 69, who already has been convicted in the five killings. The jury recommended the death sentence for her in four of the deaths, but Webber has not yet sentenced her.

"No plea has been made in this case," Webber said. "If there was an agreement, it was not entered on the record in this court."

Copeland had the same response for reporters who asked him before the hearing why he was willing to change his plea to guilty and after the hearing for his reaction to Webber's ruling.

"Aw, go jump in the river," he said.

First assistant U.S. attorney named

TOPEKA — U.S. Attorney Lee Thompson announced Thursday the appointment of Brent Anderson as first assistant U.S. attorney for Kansas.

Thompson also announced he has named Jack Williams chief of the criminal division in his office and named Emily Metzger chief of the civil division.

He said the administrative headquarters of the U.S. attorney's office has been moved from Topeka to Wichita. The U.S. attorney will continue to maintain an office in Topeka, and also has an office in Kansas City.

Area workers plan peaceful parade, support U.S. troops in Persian Gulf

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

A conversation between co-workers at an area manufacturer led to the planning of a parade scheduled for Saturday to show support for the troops fighting against Iraq.

Called the Working Class March, the parade is to begin at 10 a.m. in the parking lot of the Manhattan Town Center, proceed down Poyntz Avenue to 14th Street, turn north on 14th and then march to the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial on campus, said Gene Goslin, a parade organizer and a maintenance technician at Parker Hannifin Corp. Rubber Hose Facility in Manhattan.

"We're not pro-war, we're not anti-war," Goslin said. "Since they (the troops) have to be over there we just want to show we support them."

After the parade reaches the memorial, a prayer will be said for the safe return of the soldiers and prisoners of war in the gulf and a speaker will make a few remarks, said Scott Ridder, an organizer of the parade and a maintenance technician at Parker Hannifin.

Ridder said his involvement began when he heard about the chalk writing on the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

"The thing that got me riled up was when they marked up the war memorial," Ridder said. "Those guys died in another time, another place, another war. There's no call to do that."

Both Goslin and Ridder said they do not want to see veterans of Operation Desert Storm face the same lack of support and respect that was shown to Vietnam veterans when they returned from service in Southeast Asia.

Both also said they wish to avoid the type of conflicts which marked the pro- and anti-protests last week on campus.

"They're free Americans and they expressed their opinions. And we're free Americans and we want to express our opinions," Goslin said.

"It's not a demonstration. It's not a protest. It's just what we're calling it, a peaceful parade," he added.

Ridder said members of area American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars and Sons of American Legion posts have been invited to participate in the parade. Goslin said local Boy Scout troops and employees from area manufacturers have also been invited.

Those people who would like to participate but cannot walk will be given rides in the parade. Those wishing to be in the parade should go to the southeast corner of the Manhattan Town Center parking lot near the Manhattan Milling Co.

Anyone who wishes to march in the parade is invited, Goslin said.

Iraqi history expert says war not needed

KIMIS HATJITIMOTHEADIS
Contributing Writer

Sarah Shields, Ph.D., said she believes the war in the Persian Gulf could have been avoided, and she has expertise focused on 19th century Iraq to support her opinion.

It all started in the 1950s, she said, when the United States started behaving as an imperial power in the Middle East.

Before the '50s, she said, the only real contact the United States had with Iraq was through the oil business.

"But during the '50s, we got more and more involved in the Middle East," Shields said. "We tried to create our own sphere of influence as a response to the Cold War."

"During the '50s there were many independent movements in the Middle East, and we got very frightened," she said.

And in 1963, she said, the United States helped the Ba'ath party — Saddam Hussein's party — overthrow the existing government in Iraq.

She explained that the United States did not like the nationalist movements in the area, because nationalism in the Middle East tends to come in the form of anti-imperialistic movements. She said Arab nations wanted to achieve independence against foreign occupying powers, so anti-imperialism and nationalism became synonymous.

Shields defined anti-imperialism as opposing empires that spread across the globe.

She said that Saddam has been called a nationalist by some people, but she doesn't agree.

"He can claim to be a nationalist, because he stands up against the West," she said. "But he's not. Hussein does not believe in independence and control by the people — He is a dictator," Shields said.

She said that when Saddam's forces invaded Kuwait, he was counting on the unpopularity of the Sabah family — the existing governing family — throughout the world. She said he was expecting support, and was very surprised not to get it.

This is when the United States came in.

Saddam was very unpopular before the U.S. troops went to the Middle East, Shields said. It was when the U.S. troops went to Saudi Arabia that the premise of discussions changed.

Shields said it then became more important to stand up for independence from western intervention than to oppose Saddam.

"Arabs could take care of what it was — an Arab problem — but we didn't let them do so," she said.

Then she added that President

Deployed troops still pay rent

Some Manhattan landlords refuse to break soldiers' apartment lease contracts

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Before military personnel were deployed to the Persian Gulf, they were forced to tie up some loose ends — including ending their apartment lease agreements.

The policies most Manhattan apartment managers have for breaking leases did not change due to the deployment. Basically, the soldiers are faced with paying rent on the apartment until management or the renter finds someone who will take the lease.

Lease commitments are binding contracts, said Chris Curtin, of the Curtin Co.

"We do not pick and choose payment privileges by vocation, employer or marital status. When someone leaves with a remaining lease obligation we attempt to re-lease the apartment and, if successful, we end the first lease," Curtin said.

Broken leases with the Curtin Co. are placed on a list in order of the time the renter contacted the office and are re-leased on this basis, he said.

Charlie Busch of McCullough Development Inc., said if the soldiers received permanent change of orders they are released from the lease. Also, if they do not receive a housing allowance which would cause a financial difficulty, the company lets them out of the lease.

"For those who do not qualify for these programs, they sign a termination-of-lease agreement. Then when the apartment is rented, the lease is terminated and we waive all normal changes of re-leasing," Busch said.

Clara Hutton, manager of the West Park Apartments at 711 Donde, said deployed military personnel with leases at West Park will be responsible for the rent until the lease expires or someone takes over the lease for them.

"We will show their apartments first; they have high priority but we can't let them go out of the lease. This is a business," she said.

Soldiers who are single, however, were let out of the lease for the cost of the deposit, Hutton said. She said this is because it is unnecessary to pay for an apartment that would remain empty.

Student receives phone call from brother serving in gulf

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Michelle Wickey, senior in apparel and textile marketing, said she feels like she was given a gift from God.

Wickey was given the chance to spend the summer in Germany with her brother, Thomas Wickey, who is now stationed in the Persian Gulf. It had been about two years since she had last seen him.

"My mom and I both got to go. We didn't think we would both get to go because I'm going to school and money's really tight. But, we had been saving for awhile and we decided we might as well go now. Mom got to go for three weeks and I got to stay with him for two months," she said. "It was the best thing. Otherwise, we were going to wait and go this next summer. It was like something was telling us, 'go this summer.'"

Wickey said the time she spent with her brother allowed her to get to know him as an adult and learn about his life. It was reassuring for her, as well, to hear what his friends had to say about his accomplishments in the military.

"They were saying how he was such an outstanding pilot," she said. "It was really weird because no one had any idea there was a war coming up or anything, but they were saying, 'Your brother is such a good pilot. If there were ever a war I'd want to be with him.' Basically, it was a consensus that he was outstanding and that made me feel really good. If I wouldn't have gone and wouldn't have heard all of that, I would be a lot more worried right now."

Thomas Wickey had always wanted to fly. All of his life, all he ever talked about, all he ever dreamed about was flying, she said. He even drew pictures about it.

"And now he's a pilot. The Army allowed him to do that. The Army allowed him to fulfill a dream, to fly," Wickey said. "It sounds corny, but it's true."

As a Black Hawk helicopter pilot, Thomas Wickey may be facing combat in the gulf. Wickey said it is in such a dangerous position.

"Since there is a chance, you don't like to think about it, but there is a chance he may not come back. It's hard to think of someone shooting at your brother. What makes it so hard is the fact that my brother, and all of his friends I met this summer, I don't know if I'm going to see them again," Wickey said with tears coming to her eyes.

"He was telling me when he had

EDITORIAL

Deluge of information often hides truth

I finally got it. It just came to me. I was slightly eclipsing the speed limit on the Konza Prairie Parkway when I heard my true calling at last. My aspirations in Philosophy and English were totally in vain. Now I know I was destined to be a Pentagon Organizational Military Euphemistic Namer (OMEN for short).

I would give bloodcurdling names to all our means of destruction, sparkle our leaders with catchy nicknames, and dress each conflict in fancy clothes so that it might go down infamously in high school history books. Mom and Dad, when you thought that I'd never find a job, boy were you wrong.

Who is the creative mastermind behind all these wonderful terms for guns, ammo, wars, people, offensives and the like? It's got to be some person who gets paid mega-bucks to dream up things like "Just Cause" for the name of an invasion (not to be mistaken with "Just Cause"). I can just see some OMEN saying "Hey, I heard about the new multi-megaton ICBM. Wait till ya get a load of the name I got for it. I figure if you call it 'Peace-Keeper,' even the folks out in the Midwest will buy it."

I'm sure I could come up with some new titles for various Pentagon toys. Take the present conflict for example. It seems like a "Patriot" missile ought to be able to shoot down a Scud, by sole virtue of its name. Similarly, the U.S. Navy's "Tomahawk" missile should seem to strike fear in the hearts of enemies to Old Glory everywhere. And who ever heard of a Frog doing any sort of damage anyway?

The Iraqis definitely need to work on the names of their planes too. They have only Soviet-built MIGs—not really exciting stuff. We, on the other hand, have the F-14 Tomcat, the F-15E Eagle, and the F-18 Hornet to name only a few. The Defense Department has failed to announce our already overwhelming name-superiority over the Middle East.

Oh, and by the way, how about those news graphics for the war. CNN has to have their own OMENs. Who else could have synthesized their famous black and red "WAR IN THE GULF" promo that dances across my 12-inch screen to the bated beating of timpani? But perhaps my favorite is CBS's stickler, "SHOWDOWN IN THE GULF." Way to go America, turn a war into the equivalent of the Super Bowl. Who knows, maybe they'll retire Bush's suit after his term(s).

Now if I were to achieve OMEN status, my first job would be to change the "Department of Defense" to the "Department of Offense." Come on, it's what everybody wants anyway. Why mince words—take peace by "Storm."

Next, I would add a little spice to our politicians. After all, it's not fair that Saddam Hussein has so many great epithets, and, so far, Bush has only a long line of dirty jokes (and Dan Quayle) to be proud of. So, I figure we should start addressing our Commander-in-Chief as George "the Hammer" Bush, or maybe George "the Baghdad Bomber" Bush, or perhaps for a more masculine feel, we could call him simply: "the Bushmeister."

Colin Powell, chairman of the joint Chiefs of Staff, is going to need a little help as well. How about General Colin "Pow-Pow" Powell, or General Colin "War-Guy" Powell, or, more appropriately, General Colin "I can't answer that question at this time without endangering national security" Powell. That might be a little long, so let's just keep a good thing going and call him: "the Powellmeister." (Sorry, Mr. Fitzwater, "Fitzwatermeister" just doesn't work so I'm afraid there's no hope for you.)

Well, for those of you who are still reading this, I'll disperse with the stupidity and cut straight to the chase. I'm tromping through this spiel (yes, I'm sorry to say I made the whole thing up) to illustrate a point I think important to keep in mind while watching the tube.

Right now, there is nothing short of a deluge of war information from all forms of media—even Mr. Rogers is keeping his neighborhood updated. And although "facts is facts," it's not always easy to hold tight to the truth. The Pentagon issues a "formal" statement saying one thing (and very little of it), other U.N. nations are assuring something else, friends may be telling a totally opposite story, POWs are making statements denouncing America and the war, each news anchor is pronouncing the Middle Eastern cities differently (I've heard "Dhahran" said about ten different ways now), 60 Minutes has an entire show devoted to scaring the hell out of you and Iraq continues to make new threats while making good on a few old ones. What am I to believe?

I want desperately to believe what my country tells me, but I guess it's my chronic cynicism that tells me to be more than just a little skeptical about news footage that has a little tattoo in the corner reading "U.S. Military Pool Tape." After seeing this, I just can't help drawing a mental picture of Pentagon officials/censors huddled around a VCR with a slice of Domino's in one hand and a scalpel in the other.

One indisputable fact is that our politicians have learned their lesson. This war, there won't be any newsreels depicting American soldiers as civilian killers, and neither will there be much national footage of mass public protest as in Vietnam. Even as you read this, a group of collegians from our own K-State is on its way to participate in a national rally for peace in Washington, D.C. There probably won't be that much press coverage. About 80 percent of the nation's population is in favor of the war, and the government definitely wants to keep it that way.

The best advice I have to offer is to take with a block of salt every morsel of information that the media, both foreign and domestic, tries to force-feed you. I know this means I'm discrediting all that I have just written, but I'm sure after last week's collection of wonderful columns concerning the war, many people might want to do a little renaming themselves—perhaps Collegian "Communists" is more opportune to some.

Well Mom and Dad, I'm sorry I gave you such false hopes of a solid career for me in government, but I figure with all the name-calling in this world, I can always get a job writing bumper-stickers or something.

Peace come soon. Bring our troops home safely.

King's holiday should be more than just a day off

As the other 49 states were enjoying a federal holiday on Monday, one state was doing what it does every Monday.

This situation surrounding Martin Luther King Jr.'s holiday is quite symbolic. It shows that we still have not achieved the 'dream' he spoke so freely about.

Arizona did not celebrate the holiday. What they did do was pass a slyly worded resolution that did away with the holiday. As a result, the Fiesta Bowl lost its signed teams and had to then offer big minority scholarships to other schools to save face and get someone to play in the bowl game. The fiasco goes one step further as the halftime show centered around Martin Luther King Jr.'s life.

At this point the fight had been lost, or at least completely overshadowed. The whole situation poses one question. Have we really come very far?

But before we condemn a state for its actions, let's look at ourselves. Did we get up on Monday morning and think of celebrating King's holiday, or did we just take the day off?

The difference is rather important. It is the difference between believing in King's dream and doing something about it, or just accepting it and taking the day off.

Cry simplifies

Editor,
"No blood for oil" is the battle cry for many people who are opposed to our actions in the gulf. This is a blanket statement and a half-truth at best. I contend that there are a few other variables involved.

Saddam Hussein, a.k.a., "the butcher of Baghdad," is a tyrant. Amnesty International has over 100 violations on record for him alone.

- Using chemical weapons on his own minorities.
- Torturing children to get at the parents.
- The cutting out of tongues and gouging out of eyes to name a few more.

The United Nations had a near unanimous vote to stop this man. There is now a multinational force in place in Saudi Arabia attempting to do just that.

I truly hope and pray that we will have peace and that no one else will die, but a statement like "No blood for oil" is an attempt to simplify a very complex problem.

Policies challenged

Editor,
It is my belief that the idea and the practice of killing each other as an acceptable form of human interaction is immoral and barbaric and does not resolve differences or promote peace.

Am I saying that the soldiers fighting for the United States and other armies are immoral barbarians? No. Members of the U.S. Armed Forces are doing their jobs. They are more responsible for war than I am. After all, it is my tax money that pays their salaries and buys their guns. If you pay taxes and live in this country, then you're responsible, too.

Although I respect and support any soldier who refuses, for moral reasons, to participate in killing, I don't expect many of them to act in that way. Very few people in history have had the spiritual and moral fortitude to risk nonconformity in such a closed and violent system.

It is enough that the soldiers are ordered to put their bodies on the line in this and other wars. It is too much to expect them to lead the resistance to war also. It is our job to put our minds and spirits into creating conditions so that others do not have to die in such violence.

If you are content with a world in which we live in the persistent fear of violence from our fellow human beings; if you think that it is acceptable that military spending all over the globe continues to drain resources from human needs while, for instance, 40,000 children die of starvation everyday; if you think killing each other is an acceptable form of human interaction, then you should sit back and let events like those of the last few days continue to define the human condition.

If you hope for a world where human interaction is carried on in an atmosphere of non-violence and mutual respect; if you look forward to a time when resources are used in life-affirming endeavors, then it is time now to advocate for change.

If it is unacceptable to question and challenge the policies of our government, then we no longer have a democracy. The military personnel in World War II Germany followed orders to kill six million Jewish people. Did we not learn from this tragedy that what government leaders order us to do is not always what we ought to do? This will only be the last war if we make it known that war is not acceptable to us. Now is the time to be counted among those who think that there must be a better way.

Soldier knows

Editor,
Reading the Collegian Thursday morning, I found the opinion column titled "Better welcome deserved." I read it with growing discomfort, and finally I had to respond.

I have a friend serving in Saudi Arabia right now. He and I had many talks about the possibility of war and what it would mean.

He knows I'm protesting. In fact, he asked me to protest.

I know that he would be protesting if he were here.

He knows that the protestors are not trying to show a lack of support for our troops. He knows that we are trying to bring him back safely.

He knows that it is his duty to obey, and he knows that most protestors commend him for doing so.

He also knows what the real reason is for the United States' involvement in this situation. In fact, it was he who helped me see what it was.

If the United States were so concerned with human rights, we would have forcefully interceded in China, El Salvador and South Africa.

If the United States were so concerned about "naked aggression by one country toward another sovereign nation," we would not have invaded the sovereign nation of Panama.

Looking for the root of our government's hypocrisy, we find that, as my friend in the gulf told me, "It may not be oil, but it certainly ain't our ideals."

In fact, we came to the conclusion that all of our military action since Vietnam has been for only one reason. And that reason is to boost the administration's ratings in the opinion polls, and to keep the American people's minds off of our big problems.

He knows that this is just another instance of the government sacrificing our money, our ideals and our lives for its own little power game.

He knows one last important thing. He knows that when or if he gets back to American soil, I will not spit in his face.

He knows that I will be saying, "Welcome home."

Police differ

Editor,
In Thursday's Collegian, K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom is quoted as saying that people like myself who have spoken to the media concerning recent death threats and other harassment, have done so, "more for publicity than for the actual crime of it. What I'm hearing is that they're trying their case in the media."

Number one, it might be nice to know who Beckom is 'hearing' these things from. (A reliable, high-level source in the insidious peace movement politburo, no doubt.)

Number two, in my own case the media contacted me, not the other way around.

I'm glad I contacted the Riley County Police Department concerning the threat I received, where it appears to have been taken seriously, not to mention professionally.

Show's intrigue seen as raw art

Marshall brings strong mix of wit, satire to stage show

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

The NEA has spent their money well on Susan Marshall. The ideas and movements of the choreography are just innovative enough to accomplish at least one of the intentions of art — communication.

Movements, more than dance, were the strong points of an otherwise intriguing display of raw art. Susan Marshall and Co. lived up to their billing as a witty, compassionate, sexual and satirical show.

The intrigue of the show was in the communication. The basic expression of each of the movements by the dancers showed us exactly what we know about humanity. The company portrayed a reality altogether different from the one in which most of us live, and yet completely understandable because of the feelings and emotions that movements so easily convey.

The show began with a piece titled "Arms," appendages not usually exalted by traditional dance. Two spotlighted dancers, Susan Marshall and Arthur Armijo, engaged in a combative sort of touching.

Their hypnotic movements began to symbolize the struggles of human relationships, power and comfort. Without dancing out a story, or even a complete thought, the performers exhibited universal humanness. It was simple enough to relate to and basic enough to express an unsolvable complexity.

The second piece, "Contenders," was inspired by ABC's coverage of the 1988 Summer Olympics. The piece attempts to combine the drive for individuality and single-handed achievement, with the equally strong need to belong to the group — to be a part of the team. The work is structured around an ambiguous sporting event in which the participants compete with each other and against each other.

Christopher T. Assaf/Staff

The dance, "Contenders," is performed by members of Susan Marshall and Co. as the second piece Thursday night at McCain Auditorium. Choreographed by Susan Marshall, the dance was derived from ideas Marshall had after watching the 1988 Summer Olympics.

The sporting event takes us through complete life cycles and a multitude of levels. The meditative music of Pauline Oliveros is especially helpful for understanding each of the scenes and poses. The climax of the piece occurs during its supreme irony.

The eight dancers pair up and visually represent the great struggle between individual freedom and the deep desire to connect with another person. The irony of this conundrum is driven further by the accompany music we hear as each of the couples unsuccessfully attempts coitus in a bizarre array of positions and contortions. They point out that sex is essentially humorous.

The dancing seemed to live through something for us. The cycles of life seemed to flash before our eyes in muscles flexing and relaxing, hands reaching, legs bouncing, pointing, stiffening and jumping. The company explained for us that part of life which can only be explained by the body.

Senate adds new position

New post to improve Student Senate, alumni relations

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

The K-State Student Senate approved the creation of a new cabinet position in its meeting Thursday in the K-State Union.

Fred Wingert, sophomore in business, was approved to fill that position, which is intended to improve relations between Senate and the Alumni Association, said Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt.

Heitschmidt said the position was not formed to alleviate current problems between the two bodies.

"There were no problems between Senate and the Alumni Association," Heitschmidt said.

By the nature of Heitschmidt's position, he must attend numerous committee meetings, he said. The new position was created to lighten Heitschmidt's load and provide a person who can devote more time to the Alumni Association.

"His biggest qualification is his experience with the Alumni Association," Heitschmidt said of Wingert. "He worked with them last spring as a member of Todd Johnson's cabinet."

Wingert said he is looking for ways to involve the Senate with K-State alumni. One idea is sending all alumni a license plate or key chain with some form of K-State insignia on it to help promote the University.

In other business, the appointments to the positions of senate-intern coordinator and personnel-selections coordinator were approved by Senate.

Jeff Peterson, freshman in animal science and industry, will serve as the personnel-selections coordinator.

His job will be to give recommendations to the Senate on the hirings of persons paid through student fees, such as the Associated Students of Kansas director, Heitschmidt said.

The intern coordinator is Rod Olin, junior in journalism and mass communications. He will supervise the 18 senate interns when they are approved by the Senate.

Lady Cats host national power

Cowgirls, ranked 23rd, invade for clash between league's best

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

The Big Eight women's race, just five games old, has raised some questions with regards to a front runner in the conference, including a few from Lady Cats coach Susan Yow.

"Oklahoma State was beaten last week at Nebraska and we won at Nebraska," Yow said.

Add in Iowa State's victory at K-State, followed by a Cyclone loss at Oklahoma State, and what's left is a very puzzling picture.

Saturday, the Lady Cats can clear up the unsolved mystery when they play host to the 23rd-ranked Cowgirls of OSU. Tipoff is scheduled for 7 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State, 3-2 in the conference and 10-6 overall after an impressive home court victory over the Oklahoma Sooners on Wednesday, can vault itself into a share of first place with a victory over the highly-touted Cowgirls.

Oklahoma State, 4-1 in the conference and 15-3 overall, features a very balanced attack, with five players scoring in double figures. Lisa McGill heads the list, chipping in 13 points and over seven rebounds per game.

The Cowgirls work from the inside to the outside, whereas the Lady Cats hope to utilize the perimeter skills of seniors Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim, who carry 19.8 and 17.1 scoring averages.

A big factor in the outcome should be in the backcourt matchups, as the game pits two of the better sets of guards in the country in O-State's Liz Brown and Althea Cox versus Mary Jo Miller and Hazim. Brown and Cox are combining for 21 points a game.

"I don't think their guard tandem is any better than ours," Yow said. "I just don't feel like there are two guards better than Nadira Hazim, both offensively and defensively, in the Big Eight."

"I think Mary Jo Miller matches up very well with their point guard. Brown may be a little quicker, but she doesn't have a supporting off-guard and small forward like ours does."

Yow expanded on Miller's impact on the game.

"If Mary Jo comes into the game with her head on right and plays a great floor game," Yow said, "we will be in the thick of things."

Another attraction will be the showcase of last year's Co-Big Eight Players of the Year in Cowgirl point guard Liz Brown and Diana Miller, both of whom use their experienced and intelligent play to expose their opponent's weaknesses.

Execution has been Yow's battle cry in recent practices, which is no coincidence with the Lady Cats posting six wins in their last eight games. As instrumental as an effective half court offense can be, it's the transition game that separates the Lady Cats from many of their opponents.

"It's like our bread and butter. We like to get the ball up and down the court," Diana Miller said. "Mary Jo's passing is the key. She leads our fast break. We just fill the lanes and she creates the plays for us."

The game very well could be the biggest game played in Bramlage all year.

"I think it will be a great, great game, and we have a golden opportunity for an upset, especially playing here in Bramlage first," Yow said. "I think you'll see two evenly matched teams that are well coached, very disciplined and wanting the game very badly."

Super Bowl XXV pits Bills, Giants

By the Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — To Marv Levy, Sunday's Super Bowl is "the biggest game in my 40 years of coaching." To Bill Parcells, it's simply an important end to 27 weeks of meetings, practice and games.

That's easy enough to understand.

None of Levy's Buffalo Bills have been this far, although Levy was an assistant on George Allen's 1972 Washington Redskins. Parcells' New York Giants have 22 players and nine coaches with at least one Super Bowl behind them.

So far, the 62-year-old Levy has made the biggest faux pas, becoming on Tuesday the first coach in 25 years of Super Bowls to miss a media session. The result: a reprimand from NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue with the threat of a fine or other action after the game.

"We're putting it aside as a minor element," Levy said Thursday. "I tend to discount anything that will happen outside the 100-yard rectangle that we're playing in."

The Giants think the same way, particularly since there's only a one-week break between the conference championship games and the Super Bowl rather than the customary two weeks. Simply, that means the rookies — in this case, the Bills — would have had more time to get nervous.

Wildcats searching for league triumph

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

This, finally, is the end of the road. And Tom Bodett probably didn't leave the light on for K-State's men's basketball team at Motel 6 in Stillwater, Okla.

But Coach Dana Altman and crew are likely thankful that Saturday afternoon's contest against Oklahoma State will finally bring to an end a string of three straight conference road tilts that have, thus far, seen the 'Cats winless and frustrated.

But the road through Stillwater is a rocky one, indeed.

The Cowboys are 12-4 overall and 1-2 in Big Eight play, and, according to Altman, much improved under new coach Eddie Sutton.

"It's an awfully talented basketball team that's playing with a great deal of purpose. They're not taking any possession casually — both offensively and defensively," Altman said of OSU. "All possessions mean a great deal to them."

"They really have grown together as a team, and Coach Sutton has given them a lot of purpose both offensively and defensively."

OSU's unquestioned leader is Byron Houston, the 6-foot-7 junior center who averages 23 points and just under 10 rebounds a contest.

"They look to him so much. He's got the potential to get 30 to 40 points on a given night because their possessions are geared to look to him every time," Altman said. "He can explode any night."

"If a team doesn't do a good job guarding him, he can get those points. He may not be as explosive, say, as a Doug Smith ... but he can definitely score when he gets the ball inside."

If K-State, 10-6 and 0-3, is to avoid starting the Big Eight campaign 0-4 for the first time since 1983-84, they'll need a resurgence from Jean Derouillere, the senior guard expected by many to be an All-Big Eight performer at the start of league play.

Altman said Derouillere, who averages 17.6 points a game but had just five Monday against UMKC, needs to battle his own inconsistency.

"He had the same problems a year ago with his consistency, and he had the same problems in junior college with his consistency," Altman said. "It was something that we had hoped had worked itself out."

"He needs to step up, and we've talked about it, and now he's got to make some adjustment to his pre-game approach to make sure he's as focused as he can be. I don't think people have stopped Jean this year. I think he's stopped himself occasionally."

Building of team on-going process

Better players, backing key in effort

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

For tennis coach Steve Bietau, looking at the past is to always be looking to the future.

When Bietau took command of the tennis team in 1985, he inherited a program that had just one winning season in its history and was perennially seventh or eighth in the Big Eight. Developing a successful program would be a long process of small strides taken over several years.

Bietau found the program lacking funding and scholarships, and trying to get by with marginal facilities. Such conditions limited the quality of players the school could attract. The team struggled to marks of 4-8 and 4-12 in Bietau's first two seasons.

"Until those funding problems were resolved, we didn't have the chance to compete," Bietau said. "All the aspects of the program were weak. We had one and three-fourths scholarships for the team, and our facilities and equipment were in bad shape. The athletes that we had just weren't competitive."

"That's not to take anything away from the people we had here at that time, but they weren't players you could look at and say they could compete in the Big Eight."

Lack of funding and scholarships were the program's initial hurdles, Bietau said. With such limited scholarships to give, Bietau fought an uphill battle to attract quality players. Rather than divide the scholarships amongst several players, he determined to recruit the best player he could with a full scholarship.

The tactic worked. In his first season, Bietau landed Lena Svensson, who posted winning records at No. 1 singles for two seasons and knocked off two defending Big Eight champions. In Svensson's senior year, the team made its first move toward a winning mark, finishing 7-9 and adding more quality players to the squad.

During those campaigns of slow, steady improvement, Bietau added four valuable players who helped lift the program to a new level. Marijke Nel, Helen Schildknecht, Sara Hancock and Valerie Rive led the squad to a record of 28-15 in the 1989 and 1990 spring seasons.

Each member of that group played out her eligibility last season, but Bietau said the team owes much of its development to them.

"Very much so, not just because of their performance but because they committed to come here when we didn't have as much to offer as we do right now," Bietau said. "They provided the framework for what we were trying to do."

Accompanying the additions of more talented players was the improvement of funding and support from the University. That, more than anything, has helped in the process, Bietau said.

"The big thing that has changed from the previous administration to the one we have now is the greater equity of funding," Bietau said. "There was tremendous inequality in the way programs were funded. Right now, with the present administration, it seems like we've sort of put everyone on the same plane so that we all have a better opportunity to compete."

The big turnover of players from last season has thrust several members of the new team into the foreground. With improvements in the program have come a more challenging schedule and greater expectations. While the faces have changed, however, the destination of the program remains the same.

"I think what's happened in the last five years has just reinforced the importance of taking things step by step, accomplishing one goal at a time," Bietau said.

Intramural basketball to open tonight at Rec

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

It's time for hoopfest 1991.

The time has come for all the basketball fans, who have been watching college and professional basketball slide into full swing, to start some of their own action.

The K-State intramural basketball leagues open tonight with the first set of games at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Basketball is by far the most popular intramural sport with the student body, said Steve Martini, director of intramurals. This year, Martini reported 335 teams registered for the six-week program, with an upswing of teams in the independent leagues.

"The interest in intramural basketball is the largest. There are a lot of people out here practicing," Martini said. "We have had quite a few court reservations, and the building has been a lot busier."

Besides being the largest intramural sport, basketball requires much more dedication on the part of the Rec Complex staff. The gym will be occupied every night including the weekends for competition, except during K-State basketball games.

Basketball also requires a great number of officials to keep competitive college students in line. Martini reported that there will be 91 student officials for the season. Each official will work around 50-80 hours of basketball games during the season.

"We have 91 officials, which is one of the largest numbers we have had in a few years. It is very encouraging, and we probably have six or seven women," Martini said. "If you want to learn to officiate and have the opportunity to do it, this is a great opportunity."

Along with basketball comes the competitive nature of the sport. Add in officials that are just learning to officiate, and there are obviously going to be some mistakes. Martini said his time spent at the Rec Complex increases 25-30 percent, and if he is not there, he is at home worrying about the games.

"Basketball season is a high pressure time because we are dealing with so many teams, dealing with so many officials and just because of the nature of the game," Martini said. "Basketball is not an easy game to officiate. People yell and scream at the officials, so sportsmanship is really vital to our play."

Over the Christmas break, the new point standings in the four intramural divisions surfaced with a new look in some of the leagues. Sigma Alpha Epsilon took over the lead in the fraternity division with 757 points. Tau Kappa Epsilon is second with 694, and Sigma Nu is third with 550.

Edwards Hall is atop the residence halls with 440, followed by Marlatt 5 at 424 and Haymaker 8 with 368. Alpha Delta Pi is leading the women's league with 493, with Kappa Kappa Gamma and Alpha Chi Omega close behind at 434 and 399, respectively.

The Teke independents have a solid grasp on the independent division with 561 points to Phi Nu Pi's 349 and Indy 500's 339.

'Cats having trouble from 15 feet

Scott Paske

Sports Reporter

When James Naismith invented basketball more than a century ago, did he calculate that 15 feet would give fits to those attempting to enjoy his game?

To illustrate, I recall the end of a Syracuse basketball game in 1988. The Orangemen had a 10-point lead in the game's final two minutes. The opposing team was forced to foul and send Syracuse players to the free-throw line.

Not being a big fan of Big East Conference basketball, I enjoyed watching the Orangemen repeatedly miss their charity tosses. Syracuse managed to win the game, but its true weakness had been exposed.

A lot of things are funny when they happen in someone else's backyard.

But the laughing has stopped. The ugly illustrations are being drawn with a purple crayon.

K-State is battling a bad case of free-throwing futility this season, hitting just 62.8 percent of its attempts, barely good enough for seventh in the Big Eight Conference.

To place that in perspective, consider that if the Wildcats remain at that figure for the rest of the year, it will be their worst effort since 1965-66, when K-State made just 61 percent.

Are there any reasons? Is the goal moving? Is the referee handing the 'Cats a medicine ball when they toe the line? Are the ghosts of K-State free-throw wizards Steve Henson, Tim Jankovich and Lon Kruger dead?

"I really wish I could answer that," junior forward Wylie Howard said. "I don't know what it is."

Howard was one of the not-so-happy leaders of K-State's frequent botches from the charity stripe in a 94-91 loss at Iowa State on Saturday.

Wildcats' free throw woes

Free throw shooting has been less than spectacular this season. These are six of the worst games at the line this season.

The 'Cats hit 14-of-28 for the game, with Howard and John Rettiger managing just 2-of-6 each. Keith Ameron was 2-of-4 and Jeff Wires was 0-of-2.

"Atrocious" was the word K-State coach Dana Altman used to describe the performance. Players had synonyms of their own.

"That was pitiful," Howard said. "I found myself not concentrating too well. I worked on it after the game."

Howard and his hypnotist must have broken into Bramlage Coliseum between the Iowa State and Missouri-Kansas City games for some extra practice. Monday, he made 9-of-10 against the Kangaroos to snare the team lead at 72.2 percent.

George Giles, a former Negro League baseball star and coach, operates George's Place in south Manhattan. Giles' grandson, Brian, continues the family tradition by playing for the Seattle Mariners.

Negro League baseball star continues to make his home in Manhattan

Take a lesson on life from someone who knows. Forgive and forget. Don't worry about things you have no control over. Enjoy life, rather than trying to interpret it.

It's this kind of outlook that allows George Giles to laugh when he looks back on his 81 years. Scripture passages and adages about life, with an occasional "That ain't no kinda thing" reaction, are Giles' primary means of expression.

Giles' gruff voice is nearly drowned by the constant banter of the card game at the only other table in the small tavern Giles operates.

"They are my regulars," Giles said. "You treat other people right, and they'll treat you right."

"I didn't even raise the price of beer when everyone else in town did," he recalled with a smile.

Giles, like his tavern on the south side of Manhattan, is old, typical, one might almost say forgettable. But as one of Giles' many quotations goes, "You don't know me until you've walked a mile in my moccasins."

Along one wall of the tavern are the reminders of where Giles has walked. They are the memoirs from 14 years of his life, which he says people today can not begin to imagine.

Giles is one of just a handful of men still living who played baseball in the Negro Leagues before blacks were allowed to play in the major leagues in 1946. From 1925 to 1939, beginning at the age of 15, Giles was a star first baseman in the Negro Leagues.

Giles has seen the best in baseball. He has seen the world. He has seen success. But most of all, he has seen hard living, and he has seen discrimination.

While the Babe Ruths and Dizzy Deans of his day became celebrities, the stars of the Negro Leagues lived the lives of barnstormers, playing in large stadiums one night and in cow pastures the next.

They made a meager living and traveled hard roads, but Giles said he treasures those memories and feels no bitterness over the discrimination.

"We never thought nothing of it," Giles said. "That's just the way it was then. Why go worryin' about something you got no control over. You'd go crazy tryin' to figure it out, so we just didn't think nothing of it."

Rather than feeling mistreated, Giles said he is thankful for the opportunities he received, and the lessons he learned from baseball.

"If I'd had a different life, I might feel different, but there's no use in cryin' over spilled milk," Giles said. "These guys play today for the money and the publicity, but in those days we played because we loved the game. You had to love it to put up with it all. But it was a better life than working out here on construction. It kept the homefires burning."

Giles was raised in Manhattan by his grandmother and began playing baseball against grown men at a young age. By the age of 14, Giles was so talented he earned a spot with the Kansas City Monarchs of the Negro Leagues in an amateur tryout.

It took the persuading of a white boyhood friend, Evan Griffith, to convince Giles' grandmother to allow him to travel to Kansas City for the tryout.

"If it weren't for Evan Griffith, I might never have gotten where I did. You know he must've done some talking, because I hadn't ever been out of Manhattan," Giles recalled with a laugh. "I took my own uniform and they thought I was pretty funny. I guess I looked like a hick or something."

Giles' knowledge of the game amounted to what he terms "country baseball," but he impressed the Monarchs enough that they signed him on his 15th birthday to a contract worth $120 a month.

Giles attained as much stardom as the Negro Leagues could offer while playing for several teams in the league and barnstorming throughout the country and Central America.

He helped the St. Louis Stars win a league championship in 1932 and served as player/manager of the Brooklyn Eagles in 1935.

Not until the 1970s had the accomplishments of Negro League stars begun to be recognized by the major leagues and the Baseball Hall of Fame. A recent push for more Negro Leaguers to be inducted into the Hall of Fame may help Giles gain the same honor given to such legends of the league as Satchel Paige, Josh Gibson, and "Cool Papa" Bell.

"They tell me I'll make it, but we'll just have to see how they vote," Giles said. "In New York they used to call me the black Bill Terry (after the Hall-of-Fame first baseman of the New York Giants in the 1930s). I never could figure out why they didn't call him the white George Giles."

Giles, left, spends the afternoon with his usual customers like Don Slater and Fred Warren, who have both been coming to George's Place for more than 20 years.

Giles' only remaining mementos of his playing days are old pictures, newspaper clippings and baseball cards he has collected since he quit playing in the league in 1939.

Student Publications faces $20,000 loss

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

The Board of Student Publications met Thursday afternoon to discuss last semester's financial report. Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, said indications show Student Publications Inc. will have a projected loss of $19,972 for this fiscal year. Although it is a loss in money, the corporation is not yet running in the red.

Johnson said although salaries and expenses have been substantially cut, there are several factors which influence revenue.

"With war in the Persian Gulf and a recession here at home, it is not prudent to project any more than just a slight increase in ad revenue for this fiscal year," he said.

"We're battling a recession, and that has me extremely concerned. So, whopping ad increases are not likely," he said. "Without an increase in our student allocations, we'll continue to lose money and make no progress to replace our dying equipment."

Johnson left the meeting to address the senate ad-hoc committee on Student Publications.

Travis Stumpff, ad-hoc chairman and senior in political science, said he did not get a chance to look over the material Student Publications provided the committee, which explained the situation and needs.

Johnson explained to the committee that Student Publications is facing a money and equipment crisis. Advertising income does not meet expenses and its equipment is in need of replacement.

"The confusion is Student Publications faces two crises, and on the other side, Senate has several options they can study to choose what will work best for them," Johnson said.

Tricia Thornton, ad-hoc committee member and sophomore in business, asked Johnson how Student Publications would raise more money if they were their own company apart from K-State.

Johnson told her subscriptions would be charged.

Each full-time student pays $4.80 as a line item to Student Publications at fee payment. Part-time students pay $2.50. One recommendation would be to raise the line item to $10 and $5 respectively, he said.

'Hamlet' succeeds in own right

Gibson's interpretation of Shakespeare unique in portrayal of Oedipal complex

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

Franco Zeffirelli has become one of the world's most popular opera directors and now, after directing "Romeo and Juliet" for the big screen, tries his hand at bringing another William Shakespeare play to film. "Hamlet," with an adapted screenplay by Christopher DeVore and Zeffirelli, shuns the classic interpretation of the "melancholy Dane," and succeeds by its own right. Bankable cutie Mel Gibson plays the troubled prince coming back from Wittenberg University to find his mother, Queen Gertrude (Glenn Close) wed to his uncle, King Claudius (Alan Bates). He is visited by the ghost of his father (Paul Scofield) who explains he was murdered by Claudius. Helena Bonham-Carter plays Ophelia, the girl whom Hamlet is set to marry.

From here on, Zeffirelli's movie differs drastically from the original script. Hamlet is a rather mischievous character, stirring fear in the hearts of his elders and gradually going insane.

To find out whether or not his father was, in fact, murdered, he has an acting company stage a play called "The Mouse-trap," in which a man kills the ruling king and marries the queen shortly thereafter. It is here that the most confusing scene in the movie takes place.

As "The Mouse-trap" begins, Zeffirelli has Gibson deliver the famous "get thee to a nunnery" speech to Ophelia while watching the play. According to the director, the speech is not given out of cruelty, but with the intention of delivering her from harm. Most Shakespearean scholars would disagree. In this new "Hamlet," his rage comes not from his father's death, but instead from his Oedipal Complex. His jealousy toward Claudius for taking his mother away fuels all his actions.

Reviewer says ...

'tis very strange

By rearranging the order of scenes and lifting lines to create their own, DeVore and Zeffirelli paint a convincing portrait of a lonely Hamlet. Gibson, at first, seemed out of place in the movie. I kept expecting him to shoot a bad guy or drop his tights. As the character grew and the plot got more involved, though, it became easier to see Hamlet rather than Mel. Film has so much more freedom than theater in all aspects except length, and because much of the play is left out, there are a couple of holes in Hamlet's motivation. Thus, there are some scenes where Gibson seems to overact.

His feelings toward Ophelia remain a mystery as he taunts her persistently until the end. Bonham-Carter is a brilliant actress who portrays Ophelia's disillusionment manically. Watching her character develop is fascinating from the beginning, and she delivers the most striking performance in the movie.

Zeffirelli limits his strong visual style for "Hamlet," opting for a more limited and intimate feeling. Still, some of the shots surrounding the castle are incredibly beautiful.

Although the script is manipulated to make a fairly different story, "Hamlet" is both effective and entertaining. It's based on a great story anyway, and its timeless themes translate well into modern times.

Golden Key helps Wamego students achieve potential

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Members of the K-State Golden Key Honorary are helping Wamego High School students unlock their academic potential through a mentoring program.

In a meeting Jan. 22, 15 volunteers from Golden Key were paired with Wamego students facing potential academic difficulties.

The Golden Key members were introduced to the students and engaged in small group activities to get acquainted for the program.

Lance Lewis, faculty co-adviser for Golden Key, said the volunteers are encouraged to have significant contact with their high-school student at least two times each month. "They will act as a friend. Someone for them to talk to about their choices," Lewis said.

He said they would emphasize continuing education and anti-drug messages, but not through preaching methods.

"We hope to establish a relationship and build those messages into the relationship," Lewis said.

Rosemarie Deering, a professor of education and honorary member of Golden Key, said she had worked with similar projects before and suggested the K-State Golden Key members get involved in the mentoring program.

Wamego High School was selected because of the easy traveling distance and their expressed interest.

The high school has a program called "Here to Encourage the Learning Process," or HELP. Students were selected from HELP to be in the mentoring program.

Beverly Schottler, coordinator of HELP, said she hoped the program would help the students with their goals and aspirations.

"I'm looking forward to higher grade point averages and more positive attitudes," she said.

Schottler said she has only heard positive comments about the program.

"They all said they enjoyed the first meeting and thought the program would be helpful," she said.

Rob Ward, member of Golden Key, said he volunteered for the program because the honorary's whole purpose is to make a difference in the community.

"When I was in high school if a college student would have helped me, I know I would've been more involved," Ward said.

He said some of the meetings with students would have to take place during the high school's hours to avoid conflict.

"There is an hour for high-school activities to meet during the day and the students not involved with an activity go to a study hall," he said. "This hour is the best time to meet with them."

Golden Key members anticipate this to be an on-going program every semester. Mentoring program activities for the future may include a tour of K-State, a bowling tournament and a picnic.

Center dedicated to Krider offers slides

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Students and faculty in the College of Architecture and Design now have access to excellence with the Krider Visual Resource and Learning Center.

The center, which qualifies as one of the foremost collections in the Midwest, has a collection of more than 55,000 slides and more than 100 video tapes, as well as slide projectors and other equipment, said Carolyn Pretzer, center director.

Materials are available for checkout by both students and faculty in the college.

The center was dedicated on Nov. 15, 1990 in honor of Professor Emeritus G. Alden Krider, who retired in 1977. Krider began the collection in his own office using equipment he designed. From there, the collection has grown to its present size, occupying several rooms in Seaton Hall. Pretzer said few universities have centers the size of the Krider center.

The collection is organized by a detailed filing process that makes it possible for the materials to be located quickly and easily, Pretzer said. The slides are coded with computer labels that identify them by building form and location.

Mick Charney, associate professor of architecture, said the collection is the best he has worked with as a teacher.

"This collection makes other collections at other schools pale by comparison," he said.

Charney is a member of the college's AVA Advisory Committee, which plans the future of the center. The committee works to expand the current collection through new purchases and donations. The long-term goal of the committee is to find a way to put the slide images on computer compact disks for easier access by students and faculty.

Stephanie Rolley, assistant professor in landscape architecture, also serves on the committee.

"The center has a great collection now, and hopefully with donations in the future, it can expand," Rolley said.

The College of Engineering followed Jahnke's lead and instituted an interview process of their own.

Ray Hightower, assistant dean in the College of Engineering, said the student is tracked each semester by an adviser. At the beginning of their senior year, they set up an appointment to go over their transcript with him.

"It is more than a graduation check. It is more like an exit interview. We discuss career goals and get feedback on course work," he said.

Like the College of Engineering, the College of Human Ecology relies heavily on the advising process to track students' progress. At the beginning of each semester, students meet with their advisers to fill out a worksheet, or option sheet. The semester following the completion of 85 credit hours, the dean's office receives a copy of the student's transcript.

After a comparison is made between credits completed and credits needed, the student receives a copy of the results in the mail. Any discrepancies would be reported to the student's adviser and ultimately to the dean's office, said Jean Sego, assistant to the dean for academic programs and records in the College of Human Ecology.

"We are proud of our advising program. We like to take the team approach. Although ultimately it is the students' responsibility, we try to help them the best we can," Sego said.

Students in the College of Agriculture are required to file their program of study before a graduation check can be performed, said Marian Tilford, office assistant who works primarily with students' transcripts.

"Sometimes students take a large number of hours and still haven't received a grad check. But, if a student hasn't filed we can't tell what classes they have left," she said.

The University has set up different programs to give students an opportunity to make up classes or hours they need through intercession and by allowing students to retake classes.

Diane Barker, transcript specialist in the College of Arts and Sciences, said these programs were developed simply to help students in this position.

"They never used to have intercession classes or allowed students to retake courses. It's up to the student to take advantage of them," Barker said.

years ago, when Henson and LaKeith Humphrey were battling for the team's top spot near the 90 percent mark.

The recent dilemma has Altman performing experiments in his Bramlage laboratory. For instance, dolphins are fed fish when they jump through hoops at Worlds of Fun.

"Cats are granted relaxation from windprints if they hit free throws. At the end of Wednesday's practice, the team hit 8-of-13 attempts, lowering the total of line drills to five.

"Coach Altman is certainly doing his part," Howard said. "We've been shooting 100 or 200 free throws in practice every day. It's just up to myself and my teammates to knock them down."

The solution may not be so simple, Altman said.

"I heard Billy's (Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs) comments that some people just can't shoot free throws," he said. "No matter how much you practice, you still can't hit them."

Bush never really tried to negotiate with Saddam.

"The one and very famous talk, when (Bush) offered to send the Secretary of State Baker to Baghdad, was not for negotiations," she said. "It was to deliver the news that the United States was going to be forceful," Shields said.

She said we sent the troops before letting the Arabs take care of the problem themselves.

Arabs are not supporting Saddam's aggression, Shields said, but they are against American intervention. They cannot accept American troops on Arab soil.

According to international law, Shields said, what Saddam does is unacceptable. But it's difficult for people in the Middle East to understand why some occupations are okay and some not, she said.

"Syria has been occupying Lebanon since 1982, but they are an ally now."

"Israel has been occupying West Bank and Gaza since 1967, and Turkey has been occupying Cyprus since 1974," she said.

The real question, Shields said, is why the occupation of Kuwait is wrong, but other occupations in the Middle East aren't.

She explained that Saddam invaded Kuwait because he needed the money to pay off his debts.

"He was pretty sure it was okay with the United States if he invaded Kuwait," she said.

"Our ambassador in Baghdad was instructed to inform Hussein that the United States had no treaty obligations to Kuwait, and that we would see that as an inter-arab conflict," she said.

The United States had supported his previous occupations of Iran, she said, and he was reassured the new occupation was okay with the United States.

Shields said, as a historian, it is very difficult to understand why the United States went to war with Iraq.

"We are not in war because of the violation of human rights," she said, "because we have proven in the past we don't care about that."

"We are not in war because of Hussein's aggression," she said, "because we've supported him in the past."

"And we shouldn't be worried about oil production because Hussein needed the oil to sell it. He was not going to cut the oil supplies," she said. "There is no logical reason."

Shields said what worried her the most is what would happen after the war.

"Nothing good can happen," she said. "Everything between the United States and the Middle East will be destabilized."

the individual events, like the march and candlelight vigil Monday.

Switzer said he was optimistic that the organizers would eventually be able to build Martin Luther King Jr. Recognition Week to what they wanted in future years.

"We're never satisfied because we want 100 percent of the people involved," Switzer said, "but we know that it's a gradual process. We're going to just continue to build."

Although the week is winding up, it is not completely over.

Switzer said he is hoping for a good turnout for the convocation speaker, Randall Kennedy, 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

to leave, "Michelle, you know, the saddest fact to me is that not all my friends are going to come back." It's a very stressful situation."

As a senior in her last semester, Wickey has had to deal with the stress of her brother being in combat while preparing for her life after college.

"You have to go on and live your day to day life but sometimes all you want to do is sit by the TV and worry. You have to make yourself turn the channel. I can't just allow myself to fall apart," she said.

"Since it's my senior year, I have a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. It's very hard though, to think about where I want to go after I get out of school. When something like this is happening in the world and someone who is so close to you, as family or friend, is involved, the last person you think about is yourself," Wickey said.

The Negro Leagues provided a decent living for Giles' family in Manhattan and the opportunity to play the game he loved. But finally, in 1935, Giles tired of the travel and conditions of the league. While barnstorming with a team of white all-stars in Nebraska, Giles decided to retire.

"We were playing Dizzy Dean's all-stars in Holdrege, Neb.," Giles said. "They stayed in the best hotel in town and we had to stay in another town a ways away. They didn't have showers and we had to change in the jailhouse in town. I said 'I don't need this bullshit.' I made up my mind then to quit."

"People didn't understand why I was quitting, but they didn't know anything about what it was like," Giles said. "You couldn't stay in hotels or shop in stores. Playing every day and traveling on busses. You got tired of that kind of life. You just got to try something else."

Giles and other remaining stars from the Negro League have recently been the attraction of autograph and publicity sessions to draw more attention to the league. Giles said he is pleased that the league is finally receiving some respect and believes it is important that more be done.

"We're the only ones left to tell about it," Giles said. "You got to experience something to know what it's like and we're the only ones left. These were great players, but nobody knows about them."

"When people realize what you used to be, they recognize you as different, and that makes you feel good. But I don't think nothing of it," Giles said. "That was a long time ago and there's a lot more important things in life."

We could all learn a lot from someone like George Giles.

People protesting the war in the gulf gather at a rally sponsored by the National Campaign for Peace in the Middle East in Washington, D.C., Saturday. Protestors marched from the Mall down Pennsylvania Avenue.

200,000 protesters march in Washington

Diverse crowds travel to voice war views, show support for soldiers fighting in gulf

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON, D.C. — About 200,000 Americans marched down Pennsylvania Avenue Saturday in opposition to the war with Iraq. In the march, and at rallies that kicked off and ended the demonstration, college students mixed with veterans, elderly with handicapped, people dressed in jeans and tie-die shirts with those in their best casual clothes.

Anarchists dressed all in black with black masks over their faces splattered red paint on the U.S. Treasury building while a block down the street, sweatshirt-clad marchers chanting "no blood for oil" turned left to march past the White House.

"There was a real cross-section of America there. There were grandmothers and farmers and people of all ethnic backgrounds," said Stan Cox, adjunct associate professor of agronomy at K-State. "People who were there for all different kinds of reasons, environmental, people from the background of Central America work, like myself, people there for religious reasons. ... So it was not some bunch of malcontents who don't represent American society. It was American society that was there."

For the 17 students and two faculty members from K-State, the march was the end of a 26-hour bus ride that began Friday morning in Manhattan.

The march was sponsored by the National Campaign for Peace in the Middle East and began with a rally on the east end of the Mall, which runs between the U.S. Capitol and the Washington Monument.

One activist, a veteran of Vietnam War demonstrations, said he had not seen such a demonstration in the last 10 years and the size of Saturday's march 10 days into what polls show to be a widely supported war should carry a message for President Bush.

"I think the president should, and I presume he will, take note of the fact that if there are this many people protesting before many body bags have come back, and I hope this would give him a lot of pause before he chooses to take the action of ground offensive, which will result in a tide of bodies coming back," said Daniel Ellsberg, an author of the Pentagon Papers. "He can expect that majority sentiment."

"I've never been in a crowd like this," Ellsberg said. "... I find that a lot of people are marching for the first time — I've found that throughout the fall at civil-disobedience actions and demonstrations."

Ellsberg also said it was important to stop the war through diplomacy ■ See MARCH, Page 12

As a reward for their efforts in more than 20 years of research, a group of grain scientists will receive a share of $2 million from the sale of two patents, according to John Walters, president of the K-State Research Foundation.

Responding to the agriculture industry's need for a stable form of vitamin C, a team led by three grain science and industry professors — Paul Seib, Charles Deyoe and Carl Hosney — and former student Ming-Long Liao, developed technology that stabilized vitamin C. The stabilized form of vitamin C has a high nutritive value when used as a livestock feed supplement, particularly in fish feed.

The two patents were licensed in 1987 and 1976.

"The grain science department has been receiving royalties from these patents of about $40,000 a year, which has been supporting additional research," Deyoe said. "The technology has made a significant impact on the industry, which led to the interest in buying the patent."

The two patents, which were sold on Jan. 15 to R-Z Joint Venture, two firms that process aquaculture feed or fish food, are the result of six to seven months of negotiations, Walters said.

Student awarded internship National Geographic Society provides hands-on program

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

The National Geographic Society has recently chosen a geography student from K-State to participate in its internship program.

Terri Roberts, a senior in geography, is one of eight students selected nationally to work with one of the magazines or books produced by the National Geographic Society.

The program is set up for undergraduate students, in their junior or senior year, who are pursuing degrees in geography and cartography at U.S. colleges or universities, and for graduate students in the same subjects.

The purpose of the program is to give qualified students a professional learning experience through participation in various projects concerning publication of the magazine or book.

The interns are given opportunities to apply classroom knowledge and techniques to publication procedures or other geographic outreach programs at the National Geographic Society.

The student selected must have a good grade point average, along with an ability to conduct research with the rest of their research team, said Duane Nellis, head of the geography department.

6 die during coup leader protests

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) — Rumors of a plot to free the jailed leader of a Jan. 6 coup attempt provoked street violence Sunday that left at least six people dead and eight wounded, according to independent radio reports.

The dead included four reputed agents of the ousted Duvalier dictatorship lynched by a mob and two protesters shot by soldiers, the reports said.

Government and military officials denied there had been an attempt to free coup leader Roger Lafontant and said he and his 15 alleged conspirators remained under heavy guard at the National Penitentiary.

Radio reports said the disturbances began before daybreak as slum-dwellers erected barricades of flaming tires and debris in many sections of Port-au-Prince, capital of this impoverished nation of 6 million.

Radio Antilles said rioters burned a police-fire station in the neighborhood, but it was unclear whether the burning occurred before or after soldiers fired on the crowd.

In a separate incident, a mob lynched four men reputedly linked to the 29-year Duvalier dictatorship, which ended in 1986, Radio Metropole reported. It said the victims' bodies were burned.

Newspaper corrects false obituary

LONDON (AP) — A British newspaper on Sunday corrected its report nearly two centuries ago on the death of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.

The Observer said on Dec. 25, 1791, it reported "the celebrated German composer" Mozart had died 10 days earlier in Vienna.

"We are now able to confirm that the composer died on Dec. 5 and was, in fact, Austrian. As today is his birthday, we should like to take this opportunity to apologize to the composer's family for any distress," the weekly said.

The Observer added, "We should like to point out that news traveled more slowly in those days."

Suspect of mass slaying in custody

CHIMAYO, N.M. (AP) — A skilled hunter suspected of killing a policeman, a sheriff's deputy and possibly five other people, including a 6-month-old boy, was in police custody late Sunday.

Ricky Abeyta, 29, allegedly shot the two officers Saturday, when they were caught by surprise while trying to serve a restraining order on Abeyta that had been requested by his girlfriend, who was among the dead.

"Ricky Abeyta is in the custody of the state police this evening," Maj. John Denko said Sunday. "I can't go into any other detail or give you any more."

Investigators tried to gather details of the bloody dispute as they combed rocky hills for Abeyta, described as a skilled hunter by neighbors and acquaintances in the sparsely populated neighborhood near Chimayo, about 100 miles north of Albuquerque.

All seven of the victims were shot to death after what Denko described as a domestic dispute the officers perhaps stumbled upon in progress. It was the worst mass slaying in modern New Mexico history, authorities said.

The massacre apparently began Saturday afternoon, about the time state police Officer Glen Huber and Rio Arriba County sheriff's Deputy Jerry Martinez arrived.

New tax plan to benefit wealthy

WICHITA — Families with low and mid-level incomes stand to pay more total taxes under Gov. Joan Finney's proposed tax plan, according to a study commissioned by The Wichita Eagle.

Those most likely to gain from the proposed changes are taxpayers in higher income brackets, the newspaper reported in Sunday editions.

Finney campaigned as a populist determined to reduce property taxes, and pushed her program as a boon to ordinary Kansans.

The plan calls for raising taxes on a number of goods and services, such as haircuts and gasoline, in exchange for lower property taxes.

Police raid fair, arrest psychics

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. (AP) — One thing that didn't show up clearly in the crystal ball at a psychic fair was a raid.

Police arrested seven people Saturday for allegedly violating a city ordinance that prohibits anyone from profiting commercially from palm and card readings or other methods of predicting the future.

The self-styled psychics contended they were only asking for voluntary donations.

But during a five-month undercover investigation, one police officer paid as much as $40 for four visits to psychics last year and was charged $10 on Saturday, said police Sgt. Dave Smith.

"We consider these readings a fraud," Smith said. "If they can tell the future, how come they didn't know we were coming?"

Some of the arrested psychics said they did know — sort of.

Washburn looks for state affiliation

TOPEKA, Kan. (AP) — The Washburn University Board of Regents has approved a plan to step up their campaign for state affiliation.

Washburn, the country's only remaining municipal university, has been lobbying for state affiliation since 1985. Without it, the university must rely on local property taxes and tuition as key sources of revenue.

Washburn currently receives more than $6 million from the state budget, but state affiliation has remained elusive.

In her message to the 1991 Legislature, Gov. Joan Finney said she supported Washburn's entry into the state system, but she believed the state could not afford to initiate the process this year.

She did recommend increasing funding for Washburn to $7.1 million.

David Monical, Washburn vice president for planning and governmental relations, told the regents on Saturday that the $1.1 million increase is contingent on Finney pushing her budget through the Legislature.

"The more we can secure from the state, the less reliance we have to place on student tuition or local property tax," Monical said.

He suggested forming four advisory committees and a legislative coordinating committee to lobby for state affiliation.

Campus Bulletin

Campus organizations are encouraged to use Campus Bulletin. All announcements must be submitted by 11 a.m. one day prior to publication. Announcements for Monday's bulletin must be submitted by 11 a.m. Friday. Publication is determined by the amount of space available on a first-come, first-served basis and is not guaranteed. Information forms are available on a shelf outside Kedzie 118A. You must have a picture ID to submit a bulletin. During business hours, IDs will be checked in Kedzie 116 or 118A. Forms should be left in the box outside 118A after being filled out. Questions should be directed to the Collegian's news editor in Kedzie 116.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Evidence gathered in several surveys of the student body indicates that a high proportion of students on the K-State campus have lost a friend or a family member in the past 12 months.

Dr. David Balk in the Department of Human Development and Family Studies has been given funds to conduct a two-year study of college students who are coping with the death of a friend or family member. The first part of this study occurred in the Fall Semester of 1990.

Dr. Balk is looking for 80 students who are still grieving a death of a friend or family member. He is also looking for 40 other students who are not bereaved over a death and who would be willing to take part in a companion research study on coping with stress in college life.

The project will begin in early February. Arrangements are underway to provide one hour of course credit for persons who would like credit for participating in the research project.

For further information contact Dr. David Balk, Justin Hall 318, 532-5510.

Slattery says public needs to be patient, aim for peace

Representative addresses war in gulf while in Manhattan

ELVYN JONES
City/Government editor

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., said the American public must be patient in the Persian Gulf War, but he is already discussing the post-war period.

Slattery made his statements in response to citizens' questions at a town-hall meeting in the Kimball Avenue Fire Station Friday afternoon. A much smaller crowd than expected attended because of Friday's bad weather.

Slattery made a brief opening statement in which he said the war was going well and didn't want political motives to determine the pace of the war.

"I want us to allow U.S. professionals to conduct the war in a way that will minimize casualties on both sides," he said. "That means giving the air-phase adequate time. I don't want to see the ground-phase commence until the military is absolutely ready for it to go ahead."

Slattery also shared his thoughts about how the United States should proceed when the gulf war ends.

"When the war is finished, the first item of the agenda must be a regional peace conference to address the Palestinians," he said. "Resolution of the Palestinian issue is critical to the long-term stability of the Middle East."

cal to the long-term stability of the Middle East."

Slattery said the proliferation of high-tech weapons should also be addressed after the war.

"The key to preventing this sort of thing from happening in the future is to have an enforceable, comprehensive test-ban treaty," he said.

"It is absolutely critical that our president — because he is the only person in the world that can do it — be actively involved to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons. In the last 10 years we have not had that kind of leadership in Washington."

Tough sanctions should be placed on American companies and individuals who sell sensitive weapons and technologies to such unstable countries as Iraq, Slattery said. An international structure should be created in the developed countries to prevent the export of such war-making materials.

The failure to prevent such exports is what got the us in the present situation, he said.

"I'm convinced as I stand here today, there are myriad of European scientists, technicians and engineers helping Saddam Hussein build his war machine," he said. "It pains me that American technology helped develop some of those weapons we are trying to avoid."

Lessons can also be learned from the war in the type of weapons American invest in for the future. Slattery said the Tomahawk cruise missile has proved extremely effective since the air war started. Conversely, the B-2 bomber has not even been used because of its unreliability.

Slattery said he felt enough information is getting out about the war despite military restrictions on the press. He did express concerns about former high-ranking military officials working as network consultants.

"It would be nice if we had three former Iraqi chiefs-of-staff speculating on CNN on what the Iraqis might be doing," he said.

Although Slattery said the right to express dissent is basic in America, he felt demonstrations against the war might undermine the morale of some of the U.S. forces stationed in the gulf and give hope to Hussein.

Slattery said most of his mail was against escalating American activity in the gulf before war started. He said he voted in support of the use-of-force resolution because he was convinced more time would only allow Hussein to develop more weapons of mass destruction, which he

Professor combines electronics, music

SEAN MORAN
Collegian Reporter

A special brand of music will be performed at 8 p.m. tonight in All Faiths Chapel when Craig Parker, associate professor of music, combines computers and music.

Parker will perform "Studies for Trumpet and Computer," composed by Dexter Morrill. The work uses electronics with live performers accompanied by computer-generated sounds.

Parker said Morrill is considered to be one of the top computer experts in the world and he had the chance to see him perform a couple of years ago when Morrill visited K-State.

William Wingfield, instructor in music, will accompany Parker on the piano.

Parker will also play "Sonata for Trumpet and Piano" by George Antheil, "Five Scenes" for trumpet and piano by Iain Hamilton and "Zweites Hornkonzert" by Richard Strauss.

Parker, a trumpet player for almost 30 years, will also be performing for children's concerts later in the semester.

Judging team places in opener

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

The eleven K-State students and faculty members who bundled up in woolens, coats and boots and went to Colorado two weeks ago weren't going on a ski trip. They were going to judge meat.

The hard hats gave them away.

The hats were part of the K-State Meat Judging Team's uniforms. These new members spent most of their semester break preparing for the National Western Meat Judging Contest in Greeley, Colo.

John Unruh, team coach and professor in animal sciences and industry, said the team placed fourth in the competition. Nine college teams participated.

"I am pleased with how we are setting," he said. "We have just begun our season and some teams have been working together as a unit since August."

The number of teams doesn't limit the importance of the contest. For example, teams like Texas A & M University and Oklahoma State University will probably win contests throughout the year, he said.

"The contests are open to all intercollegiate meat judging teams," Unruh said.

Every year, K-State teams have competed in this first contest by "working out" in meat coolers. Members judge nine classes of beef, pork and lamb. In Principles of Meat Evaluation last semester, they learned how to evaluate meat in accordance with U.S. Department of Agriculture guidelines. Students are only eligible to compete for one year.

The team won lamb judging and pork judging divisions.

John Stika, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, placed second in the overall contest.

"The first contest was kind of intimidating," Stika said. "In the first class, people were pushing for a position to see the class and girls were elbowing. Eventually, I learned how to calm down and relax. I had to put it in perspective."

Unruh said the team will also travel to Fort. Worth and Houston, Texas contests this spring. Hotel expenses are paid by the judging team fund, but members pay for other expenses like meals.

To prepare, members practice Saturday mornings at 6:30 a.m. and some evenings during the week.

Besides judging in Weber Hall, they also go to the Excel plant in Emporia, Kan., and Roode's Meat Packing plant in Fairbury, Neb. They also visit several packing plants on the way to contests to help see as many different classes as possible.

Historically, K-State has competed well for its 61 years of meat judging, Unruh said.

"We eventually want to win a contest," said Brian Dunn, sophomore in animal sciences. "Ultimately, we would like to win the International like K-State did last year. However, we're a new team. Our coach believes we have a lot of talent."

War more than just bombs and strategies

PRESENTED HERE FOR THE FIRST TIME, THE TRANSCRIPT FROM CNN CORRESPONDENT BERNARD SHAW'S FINAL BAGHDAD BROADCAST, AS INTERPRETED BY THE GUY WHOSE PICTURE APPEARS TO THE RIGHT:

"This is Bernard Shaw, reporting live from Baghdad...I don't know if this report will make it out, but damn it, I'm a journalist and I have a job to do so I'm going to try. I rigged the satellite with tuna-fish can lids and the foil from a pack of Juicy Fruit gum. I hope it is working. If it isn't, I'm going to be really pissed.

"Just so you know, I am operating under these conditions: constant allied bombing of the city while I am holed up in a room on the top floor of a 14-story hotel with my colleagues, John Hollander and Peter Arnette; a diet of warm canned tuna and flat RC mixed with bad whiskey; and most notable, 78 straight hours without sleep.

"Sleep...I'm beginning to wonder if I ever will sleep again. I cannot hold back the fear that at any moment, this hotel will collapse in a chaotic hell of fire and concrete. I have never been this close to death. If my producers are listening, I want them to know that if I ever make it back to the states, they had better be prepared to make me an offer or I'm going to CBS, where they respect a good journalist.

Look at Dan Rather...

"As I speak, allied bombs are raining on the ancient city of Baghdad. They sound like thunder and look like fireworks. I am reminded of the Fourth of July celebration in D.C. the summer it rained constantly, but former President Ronald Reagan insisted that rain would not stop the firework display over the Mall. The whole thing here is...I don't know...somehow inspiring and patriotic. It was probably under these conditions that Francis Scott Key wrote 'The Star-Spangled Banner.' I wonder how much sleep he got that night.

"Cabin fever reigns supreme in this room. We haven't even tried to venture out into the shelled streets of the city for days. I remember the last time well. We were sitting in a nice cafe not far from Saddam Hussein's palace when we saw the girl...John Hollander claims he saw her first, but Peter maintains that John was too busy fattening himself up on soup to see anyone, and that it was he who saw her walking down North Al-Husseini Street.

"John and Peter are sleeping now, after a night of intense fighting which only stopped for the regular broadcasts. They would do a report and then go right back to arguing and pushing. John threw a lamp against the wall and it shattered. A few minutes later, that was followed by a knock at the door. We all shut up for a while until we heard footsteps walking the other way down the hall and figured we were safe. It was a scary moment. Then Peter and John started fighting again. Peter said the girl was his and John called Peter a 'stupid limey.' They both attacked me when I told them that it didn't matter who saw her because she was probably dead, just as the three of us were going to be before this was all over...

Ed
Skoog

Collegian Columnist

"I really hope this is getting through. Surprisingly, though, I'm not tired, even though I haven't slept for what seems like an eternity. The lack of sleep doesn't even seem to be having any real effect on me...but have you ever looked at your hands? I mean, really, really, really looked at your hands? Far out...mine are like five pens and pencils sticking out of a lump of clay, or the comb on a rooster's head. Wow.

"I wish we could hear what was going on in the war, but Peter accidentally flossed his teeth with the incoming channel wire. He said it was worth it because he had a chunk of tuna between his teeth and it really hurt. I guess he's right. What difference does the news make to us now? We're doomed.

"Our hotel window looks south toward Saudi Arabia. I keep searching the far edge of the horizon for movement, half-expecting to see the American flag slowly advancing. But so far — nothing. I don't know if they're fighting or not, or if the Iraqis have already won the war and the U.S. only has planes left...who knows, who cares? I'm going to die any moment anyway.

"I can't get over the irony. Here I am, probably the only reliable reporter in Baghdad, in the middle of it all, and I don't know what any of the external factors are. Is Israel fighting? Is Israel still there? Are the Soviets involved yet? What the hell is going on?

"President Bush and all the generals predicted it would be a short war, over in a few days. Well, here I am, and where are they? How many months more will I have to endure this hell? I almost wish the bombs would hit the hotel...hold on, I didn't say that. I take it back. I don't want to tempt anyone.

"If I get back to the states, I hope they throw me a ticker-tape parade. I've always wanted one of those. I was in the Marines, and I hoped for a war the whole time I was in, because I wanted to be a war hero. Now's my chance. John was joking around that since Saddam won power by killing the guy before him, and that has been the tradition for decades, that if one of us shot Saddam, we could end this war and become rich and powerful.

I laughed then, but it seems more and more plausible. If the bombing lets up, I think that'll be my plan. King Bernard...or I could even change my name. People have always made fun of my name. In college, the English-major bullies would corner me in the Union and make me answer questions about Irish literature. I refused to read 'Arms and The Man,' and got a D in World Literature because of it. I wish George Bernard Shaw had never been born. But I'm not resentful.

"I hope this gets through. This might be the last you hear from me, and if so...well, I worked this part out with my lawyer. I do want to say I don't think Leland really killed Laura Palmer. I think Agent Cooper did it, and made up the whole Bob thing just to cover his tracks.

"Anyway, that's the news from Baghdad. Bombs, hellfire, fear...it's really an endlessly random and violent world here. Besides that, nothing has really changed over the last few days. Hope the war goes well, I'm going to sleep for a while. Bernard Shaw, live from Baghdad."

Editorials

Troop support essential

Anti-war protesters pray for peace and participate in rallies, war supporters wave the flag of patriotism in backing the actions in the Persian Gulf, and those who are really unsure of what they think about the war just go on with their daily life.

We can fight and argue all we want about what we are doing in the gulf. What we really should be doing, though, is making certain the support of our soldiers is known.

They are the ones who are on the battlefields giving their heart, soul and even their lives for the liberation of Kuwait. They are the ones, even though we may or may not like the action taken in the gulf, we should be supporting.

No one wants to see them come home and have to endure the disgrace and persecution the Vietnam soldiers had to endure. No one wants to see their friends and family live with the knowledge that their country didn't stand behind them as human beings. No one wants to see their loved ones spat upon and called murderers.

People consistently compare the actions in the Persian Gulf to those in Vietnam. They wonder if we've learned anything at all from history.

It is hoped that we were taught at least one thing from that bloodied, mixed-up period in the not-so-distant past: to understand the value of the human life and the soldier who has put his life on the line for whatever reason his government gives.

They say we're making the same mistakes over again.

Prove them wrong. Don't duplicate the mistake that our soldiers in the gulf will have to pay the price for.

Scheduling correct

Editor,

In response to Ms. Dell'Antonia's editorial comments of the scheduling process at K-State in the Tuesday, Jan. 22, 1991 edition of the Collegian, I would like to point out that the Martin Luther King holiday is a day of observance. This is not intended to inconvenience the masses and the college students alike, but to remember the great contributions this man has given our society.

How one spends the 'day off' is one's choice, but it is hopeful that King and his ideals be recognized and reflected upon. Whether it be sitting in one's dorm room waiting for class to start or completing a long drive home, Dr. King and his dream should not be overlooked.

Thankfully, some 'no-brain' in scheduling had the foresight to plan this holiday. Yes, having a day off so soon does disrupt the continuity of establishing one's academic routine. Yet, I feel this 'sacrifice' reinforces the importance of this day.

While other collegiate and secondary institutions pay no observance whatsoever to this day, I am proud of this University and those 'no-brains' who did.

Actions inconsistent

Editor,

As a member of the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East, I was pleased by the turn-out at last Thursday's demonstration against the gulf war. Not only was it encouraging to see the approximately 300 people who took part in the rally and march to the Riley County Courthouse, but it also did my heart good to see the much smaller, but vocal counterdemonstrators and to hear their well thought-out arguments in favor of violence, chauvinism and xenophobia.

I couldn't decide which was more catchy, "Fuck Peace," which had a certain raw emotional appeal when pronounced with a proper grunting inflection, or "Take Peace by Storm," which seemed an obvious allusion to George Orwell's "War is Peace," "Freedom is Slavery" and, most importantly, "Ignorance is Strength." I was impressed that the counterdemonstrators were such well-read literary buffs (indeed, in a few cases, I would have been impressed if they could read at all). Such unbridled enthusiasm and energy is a tribute to our wonderful and uniquely superior democracy and its active and well-informed citizenry.

I was, however, unclear about a couple points the pro-war people made. If I understand their position, they supported the war against Iraq because they were, as a matter of principle, opposed to brutal dictatorships, illegal occupations and violations of human rights, and they see war as the best, indeed, the only way to rid the earth of terrorists like Saddam Hussein — even if it means doing so by aiding other terrorists like Syria's Hafez el-Assad or Israel's Yitzhak Shamir. If that is the case, then I am sure when this war is over they will demand not the restoration of the Kuwaiti royal family, but the UN-sponsored elections to find out whether the Emir's monarchy is indeed as "legitimate" as George Bush has suggested.

I am sure these dedicated champions of human rights will also support a presidential decision to use force against the illegal occupations of the West Bank and Gaza and Lebanon by Israel and Syria, just as these freedom fighters have no doubt consistently called for an end to the South African and Chinese occupations of Namibia and Tibet.

Perhaps then they will also volunteer for the first human wave in a jihad of democracy against the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, which (allegedly in accordance with Islamic law) flogs and executes critics of the regime, and which outdoes the Kuwaiti regime in corruption, brutality and nepotism. Naturally they will also call for the U.S. to attack many of its present allies in other parts of the world, such as China, El Salvador, Guatemala, Pakistan, South Africa, South Korea, etc., where human rights violations are widespread and well-documented.

In fact, if the stormtroopers for democracy and the American way are truly consistent in their militant opposition to dictatorship and general nastiness, then perhaps they truly do wish to "nuke 'em all and shoot 'em in the dark" as one of their numbers demanded at the demonstration. Perhaps then these irrepressible activists can form an environmental commando unit to clean up the radioactive mess.

Ribbons absent

Editor,

Regardless of what your individual views are on the current war in the Persian Gulf, I hope you are all concerned about our troops and pray for their safe return. That hope is what the yellow ribbons stand for — nothing more. Why must the Faculty Senate find ambiguity in that?

It is too bad you feel you cannot visibly display yellow ribbons on the Higinbotham Gate in support of the safe return of those individuals called to the Middle East.

Action appropriate

Editor,
President Bush is not a hate-crazed war-monger. The threat posed by Saddam Hussein is and has been very real and not some aberration created by the United States. The United States is a world power and as such has a responsibility to the world to act in cases which threaten the well-being and security of all peoples of this global community, Earth.

The world community came to a consensus that Saddam Hussein must leave Kuwait by "whatever means" after Jan. 15. He ignored the world decision and continued to threaten the nations of the Middle East who oppose his aggression and, of course, Israel.

The Arab nations are not a separate part of this world, and whether we like it or not, what they do does have an effect on the entire world, and like it or not, we all (world) have a vested interest. This vested interest is a fact, but it is far from being the only consideration.

I have confidence that if Saddam Hussein had made any meaningful overture for a diplomatic solution to the problem, Bush would never have made the decision to strike. I am sorry to see the people of the United States and other countries putting so much effort into demonstrations against actions that world leaders believe to be necessary to restore the rightful government of the Kuwaiti people.

Seeing torture and abuse of family, friends and other loved ones and all they have built pillaged by foreign invaders, I wonder how the people who are protesting this action would feel if they had been living in Kuwait under this hostile occupation since Aug. 2. I wonder if they would be thinking today, "Why don't we wait longer to see if Saddam will leave?" or maybe they would rather say, "Why didn't they (the allies) come sooner?"

May God, the God of all people, bless the people of this conflict, and may it be resolved soon with as little loss of life, on both sides, as possible.

Nurse remembered

Editor,

While I realize that many of us have our attention focused in the gulf, I just wanted to take a minute to publicly acknowledge a person on this campus. This is largely to let people know that there are some very special people on this campus.

Many of us on this campus take weekly visits to Lafene for allergy shots. Last year, our shots were given to us by Norma Parker, who staffed the allergy and immunization clinic. She always tried to be up-to-date with the newest information on allergies and was more helpful to me in understanding allergies than any doctor had been. Besides, everybody who had regular shots knows that nurses are better at it than doctors (it hurts less). She also took time out to do some extra things, like send me a card when I was hospitalized after major surgery and hold my hand through a horrible systemic reaction to my shots. After seeing her weekly for a year I felt that I had a friend, not just a nurse.

Two weeks ago, Norma died after fighting cancer throughout the summer and fall. I just wanted every person on this campus to know that there are some very wonderful individuals on this campus trying to do the best job they know how. I hope none of us take any of them for granted.

Soviets maneuver

Editor,

The morning after Congress committed our national attention to what the Soviet Union knows from Afghanistan will be years of urban guerilla holy war, the Soviet tanks rolled into Lithuania. Soviet leaders know that if we're committed to a long-term war and an attempted occupation of Iraq, our resources won't be available to help stabilize the democratic movements in Eastern Europe. So what's to lose?

Depriving Iraq of a rudimentary nuclear weapon is an unbelievably bad trade for the return of hardliners to the Kremlin or continued chaos in the only other country able to turn our world into rubble.

I think the timing was no accident. The Soviets also know we need their support to keep the United Nations' sanctions operating and spare parts from arriving in Baghdad. It may come out in historical perspective that a deal was struck for Soviet support. Ironic it would be if we've traded Lithuania's new democracy for a return of the monarchy in Kuwait.

Apology wanted

Editor,

I wanted your readers to know the Class Clown comic strip's portrayal of my store, Patricia's Undercover Lingerie, was offensive to me, my sales staff and many customers.

Men buying gifts for their wives is an important part of my customer base (two or three a day). We also carry items for men. I have spent considerable advertising dollars with the Collegian welcoming men into my store and assuring women that my store is sexy, yes, but not sleazy, so that they will feel comfortable stopping in.

I would like to address the creator of the comic strip, D.D. Moore, concerning the last frame in the Jan. 24 issue. It read: "Those women wanted me! Real bad!"

To suggest that your character would be 'wanted' by my employees or my customers was slanderous. I believe a public apology would be appropriate.

Giants simply Super

Controlling the ball on touchdown drives at the end of the first half and the beginning of the second, the Giants won their second Super Bowl by beating the Bills 20-19 when Scott Norwood missed a 47-yard field goal with 8 seconds left.

The winning points in the closest Super Bowl in history came on Matt Bahr's 21-yard field goal with 7:20 left in the game.

But the game was really won by New York's ball-control offense, which moved the ball 87 yards to a touchdown just before the half to cut a 12-3 deficit to 12-10, then held the ball for nearly 10 minutes to start the second half to take a 17-12 lead.

The Giants had the ball for 40:33, leaving the Buffalo offense on the field for only 19:27.

One hero of a game in which the lead changed hands four times was 33-year Otis Anderson, who picked the most important game of his career to notch his first 100-yard game this season — 21 carries for 102 yards. He went in from the one for a touchdown to cap the third quarter drive.

Another was Jeff Hostetler, the backup quarterback who directed the New York offense almost impeccably, running his career record to 7-0 as a starter. He completed 20 of 32 for 222 yards and a 14-yard touchdown pass to Stephen Baker.

In fact, seven was the number of the day — it was the seventh straight win by the NFC in the Super Bowl.

It was also a victory for the New York defense against an offense that had scored 97 points in two playoff games. Challenging the Bills to run, the Giants went most of the game with six defensive backs and two down linemen, blanketing Andre Reed and James Lofton and shutting down the Bills offense that had scored 95 points in two previous playoff games.

Lady Cats win overtime thriller

Hazim leads charge to 1st

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

The empty bleachers of Bramlage Coliseum have probably never witnessed a better all-around game.

From the opening tipoff right up to the final buzzer ending the overtime period, the 1,623 loyal fans in attendance Saturday night were treated to a classic contest that would have made even the ghosts of old Ahearn Field House proud.

Contrary to the beliefs of those who tuned in to the Raycom Network at 1 p.m. Saturday, K-State still fields a championship caliber basketball team, one that exhibits character and mental toughness on the court.

Caution: When reading the Big Eight standings this week, don't rub your eyes when you find K-State atop the conference — and, no, they didn't make a rule that allows the media to print standings starting at the cellar and working toward the elite.

You're probably looking at the women's race, where once again the Lady Cats are perched in first place.

With their 78-72 overtime victory against the nation's 23rd-ranked and conference-leading Oklahoma State University Cowgirls, the Lady Cats propelled themselves into a share of the league lead.

"Our experience really came through tonight," Lady Cat Coach Susan Yow said. "Our three starting seniors played like seniors tonight. I put Kristie Bahner in towards the end, and she played a beautiful game down the stretch."

Bahner, who had been plagued with foul trouble, spent much of the second half on the bench with four fouls.

K-State, 4-2 in the conference and 11-6 overall, received big games from just about everyone.

The other two seniors drew their praise at the offensive end. Nadira Hazim poured in a game-high 29 points, followed by Diana Miller, who added 25.

Many of their opportunities were created by junior Mary Jo Miller who tied a Lady Cat single-game assist record, dishing out 13.

"Mary Jo did a great job with the floor game," Yow said.

But it was Diana Miller who took over in overtime, as she put the Lady Cats in the lead at 72-70, a lead they would never relinquish.

After Liz Brown, O-State's Co-Big Eight Player-of-the-Year, and Hazim exchanged buckets to open the extra frame, it was Brown's award nemesis, Diana Miller, who went to work, scoring the Lady Cats' next six points.

Meanwhile, Brown converted the only other Cowgirl bucket during the decisive three-minute run. They would prove to be O-State's final points.

"I think we've been on a plateau the last two weeks, and we've been unable to get up above it," Yow said. "I felt like this win raised us another plateau."

The Cowgirls, 4-2 in conference action and 15-4 overall, hung tough through the first half and took a 39-35 lead into the locker room, thanks to the play they received out of the center position.

Besides fueling a rebounding margin of 39-35 in the half, Lisa McGill and her backup, Shea Jackson, tallied 24 of the OSU 39 first-half points.

O-State seemingly scored at will off a lob pass that gave the Lady Cats fits.

"They ran some nice plays," Yow said. "We knew that we just couldn't stay in the same defensive scheme and win."

The Cats kept pace, thanks to a shooting effort of 54 percent.

Fortunate to trail by only four at the half, K-State converted a steal into a Hazim layup with only one tick left on the clock.

The intermission allowed the Lady Cats to regroup and come up with something to shut down the potent inside game of McGill.

"When we went to our half-court trap, it really confused them and took away that lob pass," Yow said. "They looked fidgety and uncertain, and their passes weren't sharp."

McGill finished the game with 23 points but was silenced after her first-half explosion.

"We were getting good help-side defense," Bahner said. "I think that kind of scared them off and we forced a few turnovers so they didn't go in there as much."

The Lady Cats quickly erased the halftime margin on a Hazim jumper and two free throws by Bahner, but were by no means out of the woods as the Cowgirls went on a 10-4 run to put the score at 51-45. This equalled the largest deficit of the night.

Diana Miller gunned in a three pointer and ten footer to narrow the margin to one, 51-50.

The warriors continued exchange punches until the Lady Cats had amassed a three-point lead with 3:25 remaining on Hazim charities. Brown tied the score at 68-68 with a clutch three-pointer from 23 feet at the 1:50 mark.

Neither team managed another point in regulation, although K-State had a couple cracks in the final minute, the final being a Diana Miller jumper with six seconds that rimmed off, giving Liz Brown a chance at a miracle half-court shot that hit the backboard.

The scare was more than enough to encourage the Lady Cats to hold their lead in OT. Jennifer Grebing iced the game with two free throws at the 0:33 mark, leaving the score at 78-72 where it would remain.

"The game was everything we thought it would be," Yow said.

Defense keys team's second-half comeback

BILL LANG

Sports Reporter

Holy Sister Mary Francis! What's going on here?

What's going on here is that the Lady Cats are atop the Big Eight, and with a defense that shut down a high powered O-State women's team, they have put themselves in contention for the Big Eight title.

"In order to feel that we were in the thick of things and that we had a legitimate chance, we had to win this one," K-State Lady Cat coach Susan Yow said following her team's thrilling 78-72 overtime victory Saturday night over 23rd-ranked Oklahoma State at Bramlage Coliseum.

"If we had lost, I wouldn't have thought we couldn't win it, but they may have felt like that," Yow said of her players. "Right now, I'd say that we're in the thick of it."

This was a game dominated by team play, determination and most of all, defense. Nadira Hazim scored 29 and Diana Miller added another 25. But, before the gameball had left the referee's hand for the tipoff, the Lady Cats were ready.

"Right before we left the locker room I told the team, 'let's leave it all on the floor,'" Hazim said.

In the first half, the Lady Cats, 11-6 overall and 4-2 in the Big Eight, just about left it in the locker room, as the play of Oklahoma State's Lisa McGill left them scratching their heads.

McGill scored 17 first-half points, helping the Cowgirls to a 39-35 halftime lead.

However, the defense seemed to be too much for O-State, 15-4 and 4-2. In the second half, the Lady Cats held the Cowgirls to 39 percent shooting, while K-State shot 46 percent.

The most telling tale of the defense was the job done on the Cowgirls Liz Brown. Brown — who was co-Big Eight Player of the Year with K-State's Diana Miller — was held to 21 points and seven assists while committing five turnovers. She had been averaging about 10 assists with virtually one turnover per tilt.

O-State almost won the contest in regulation with a 35-foot heave from Brown. Then K-State's defense took over in the extra period.

"I tell you what," O-State coach Dick Halterman said. "We almost had it there. But in the (overtime) they just shut us down."

"They kept Liz in check and forced us to do some things that we don't normally do," he added. "We're still going to come out and play them the same way when they visit us. We'll be seeing them at least two more times if you count the Big Eight postseason tourney. It would help, though, if they left Diana and Nadira behind."

The overtime saw the Lady Cats hold O-State to 10 shots as they connected on two.

"We played our hearts out in this game," Yow said. "In the overtime, we just gathered around and said that we have five minutes of play and that we're going to come out winners."

As for bigger and better things, Yow knows where this team is headed.

"This is just a smidgen of what it's like to win the 'Big One,'" she said.

First-half woes continue as 'Cats drop yet another

Houston helps deliver knockout

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

STILLWATER, Okla. — During a span of 10:46 of the second half Saturday, Oklahoma State star Byron Houston was a spectator rather than a participant in his team's battle with K-State.

After picking up his fourth foul with 16:16 left and the Cowboys up by 10, 47-37, Houston grabbed a seat next to OSU's coaches and watched until the 5:30 mark.

While Houston looked on from his front-row seat, K-State had inched back into a game that the Cowboys had led by as many as 17.

But when Houston checked back in, the Wildcats knew he was on the floor.

After Cowboy guard Corey Williams missed both ends of a two-shot foul opportunity, K-State trailed by only seven, 65-58, with a chance to cut the deficit to five or four with a successful trip down the floor.

Houston had other things in mind.

The 6-7 junior grabbed one of his game-high 12 rebounds on the second miss by Williams, and tossed it out high to the backcourt reserve, who atoned for the missed charity tosses by draining a 21-foot, three-point bomb that widened the lead to 10.

Game over. OSU went on to win, 85-70.

"That was definitely the big play in the game, as far as us having a chance to come back," said K-State coach Dana Altman, who saw his team fall to 10-7 overall and 0-4 in the Big Eight.

Several other big plays came early. And each ended with a whistle. K-State's starting inside players

Wildcat Notes

- Jeff Wires scored a career-high 22 points.
- The Wildcats' six three-pointers tied their season high.
- Marcus Zeigler had four three-pointers for the third time this season.
- Zeigler now has 42 points in the last three games, after scoring 52 in the first 14.
- Keith Amerson's eight rebounds were one short of his career high.

— John Rettiger, Maurice Brittain and Wylie Howard — spent a great deal of the game enjoying the same view Houston had in the second half.

Brittain picked up his third foul with 7:20 left in the first half and K-State just down six, 26-20. He didn't return until the start of the second half.

Rettiger picked up his third personal 20 seconds later with the score the same. He, too, was done for the half.

Finally, Howard picked up his hacking hat trick with 5:11 left and the OSU lead at eight, 31-23.

Over the final few minutes of the half, the Cowboys stretched the lead to a 15-point halftime bulge. And they did it with a pair of skyscrapers — 6-10 Mattias Sahlstrom and 7-0 Johnny Pittman — scoring six points in the span with room to roam minus Brittain, Rettiger and Howard.

"We got our big people in foul trouble in the first half, and that was that," Altman said. "We didn't do a good job at all inside."

While Brittain, Rettiger, Howard, Keith Amerson and Darryl King were combining for just 20 points along the baseline, Houston, Pittman, Sahlstrom and John Potter were combining for 35.

Pittman, who scored 12, earned praise from Cowboy coach Eddie Sutton.

K-State's Jeff Wires and Wylie Howard both grab for a loose ball as Oklahoma State's Mattias Sahlstrom falls away from the two in the first half of their game in Stillwater, Okla. Wires had a career-high 22 points in the 85-70 Wildcat loss.

"Johnny didn't play that much, but he played very well and made some big plays for us," Sutton said.

After the break for the half, K-State started inching back toward the Cowboys, now 13-4 and 2-2. And the Wildcats did so on the long-range bombs fired by guards Jeff Wires and Marcus Zeigler.

Wires, who led all scorers with 22 points, scored six straight points to pull K-State to the aforementioned 65-58 score. And at the 4:02 mark, even after Houston and Williams had combined for the backbreaker, Zeigler fired off a parting shot for the 'Cats.

The junior guard drained a trey of his own — one of four he'd hit en route to 15 points — to pull the Wildcats within six at 70-64. But a 5-0 OSU run put the game away once more.

Williams said he noticed the strong play by Wires and Zeigler. "Their guards put a lot of pressure on us," he said. "We had to stay on our toes and be ready for their three-point shots and drives. They played an excellent ballgame."

The only thing that disappointed Sutton on a day in which his team downed K-State on its home floor for the third-straight year was the fact that the Wildcats were able to make a game of it late.

"As happens so often when you get a big lead, your intensity level drops a little," he said. "It shows up by maybe not playing as solid defensively and getting careless."

Careless was what Houston was early. But he was there when his team needed him.

Wires shines in defeat

Career-high 22 points not enough as Wildcats fall

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

STILLWATER, Okla. — Jeff Wires starred at the Gallagher-Iba Arena scoreboard Saturday and realized the energy spent chasing Oklahoma State guards Darwyn Alexander and Sean Sutton would be in vain.

With hands on hips, tongue draped over his lower lip, and chest expanding to take in air, the weary Wires looked desperate for solutions to K-State's problems in an 85-70 loss to the Cowboys.

For the senior point guard, a career-best 22 points was reduced to a footnote in another failed attempt at a Big Eight Conference win.

"It hurts to lose regardless of how I play," Wires said. "I'd rather have two points and win the ballgame than however many I had and lose."

Had Wires not fueled K-State's offense with 8-of-15 field goal attempts and 4-of-4 free throws, the Cowboys' celebration would have started a lot sooner. In addition to his point production, Wires had four rebounds, three assists and supplied relentless pressure that kept O-State guards from enjoying their 42-27 halftime cushion.

But Wires' soaring number in another category — turnovers — left the Wildcat playmaker feeling partially responsible for the loss. "I didn't really feel like I had that good of a game," Wires said. "I had six turnovers, and two is too many."

Still, Wires' scrappy play helped put the 'Cats in striking distance with six minutes to play. But a sluggish first half by K-State was too much to overcome.

The 'Cats shot just 36 percent, and had three players on the bench with three fouls by intermission. "We just can't come out like this any more," Wires said. "We've got to pick it up earlier."

Statistically, Wires and backup guard Marcus Zeigler were the only 'Cats who played up-to-snuff in the first half. K-State starters were outscored 30-15 by O-State's first five.

Wires had nine points — and overflew with motivation heading into the second half.

"I was thinking, 'I don't want to be embarrassed here,'" Wires said. "I tried to pick it up a little bit, and do some extra things to get our guys fired up."

Wires, who has been in double figures in the last eight games, added nine points in a two-minute span that cut Oklahoma State's lead from 12 points to 65-58 at the 6:01 mark.

But that was the end of the threat. The Cowboys hit 15-of-18 free throws in the final four minutes.

"We're ready to get back home," Wires said. "Things haven't been going well, but Kansas is next. I know the fans will be with us, and there's never any trouble getting ready to play them."

Athletes must look within when preparing for battle

David Svoboda
SPORTS EDITOR

How much is enough? That's a question we no doubt ask ourselves with regard to one thing or another on an almost daily basis. So, how much is enough?

Is it enough? Is it enough enough? Enough already.

The efforts displayed by a few members of the K-State men's basketball team, of late, surely haven't been good enough.

Or have they?

How much fight, desire and determination is enough? That's a judgement only individual players and coaches can make. Writers can't make it, fans can't make it, girlfriends can't make it. It comes from within.

That's where the members of the Wildcat squad are going to need to dig down into — within — if they're to have a fighting chance Tuesday night against arch-rival Kansas in Bramlage Coliseum.

The players and coaches need to ask themselves the "enough" question, and attempt to find an answer. The search alone might be enough to help the team gain victory for the first time this conference season.

The efforts displayed by the Lady Cats lately surely have been good enough to lift the team to a Big Eight title. Haven't they?

Good question. Early effort last year led to a nice lead and great disappointment at season's end when the conference win total the team posted wasn't enough to bring a Big Eight trophy to interim coach Gaye Griffin and her team.

So, how much will be enough this season? In the wacky Big Eight women's race — where six of the contenders are asking the same question — the answers aren't likely to be apparent until the final week of the season.

For one K-State basketball team, a pattern of solid second halves following poor opening periods hasn't been good enough. For another, the efforts of two senior standouts have been good enough to get things done against any opposition.

But what happens when Coach Dana Altman's crew strings together good halves and Jean Derouillere strings together good games. Will it be good enough?

What happens when Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim are held to a combined total of 20 points, rather than 20 each? Are their teammates good enough to overcome it?

It all comes down to desire. Steve Henson surely had it, but even with Henson, sometimes desire wasn't even good enough.

Derouillere has talent, and the desire's there in flashes, but is his current level of play good enough? That's a question he needs to ask himself.

And it's not an easy one to answer. How much is enough?

Ask yourself. It's not a question to which a simple answer is likely to suffice.

Richmond relishes days in purple

NBA career moving along well for No. 23

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

"Their dreams are being lived in the NBA."

Isn't that what the NBC TV commercial says, while portraying a young child growing into a NBA sensation — like Isiah Thomas?

This commercial probably relates to the dreams of many children around the nation, as they pretend they have taken on the identity of their idol, and single-handedly defeat their most-dreaded team.

But these dreams are lofty, as only about 50 college superstars are selected in the NBA draft each year. There are, however, the select few who happen to be lucky enough to have their dreams become a reality.

One of the most recent K-State legends to enter the National Basketball Association still enjoys talking about his days in purple and white.

He was one of the best to ever don the purple and white of the fighting Wildcats, and for that his No. 23 will always be remembered.

He's Mitch Richmond.

For Richmond, the dreams of dunking and sinking 25-footers did not begin until the ninth grade.

"When I got in high school, I started dreaming of the NBA. As a child growing up, I always had dreams of playing football in the NFL," Richmond said.

Richmond, obviously, eventually decided to drop football and concentrate on basketball. Can you imagine what 1987-1989 in K-State basketball would have been without Richmond?

In only two years of competition, Richmond accomplished feats that most players didn't in four years. He ranks sixth on the K-State all-time scoring chart with 1,327 points, behind only Mike Evans, Rolando Blackman, Bob Boozer, Steve Henson and Chuckie Williams, all of whom had four-year stints at K-State.

Richmond holds the record for most points scored in one season with 768, and has the third-highest scoring average in both a career and a single season in the history of K-State.

The stats do say a lot about the caliber of player Richmond was for the Wildcats, but are not high on his most treasured memory list.

If you can think back a couple of years, Richmond led the Wildcats to a K-State record-tying 25 wins in a season. It also seems kind of ironic that Richmond's final season was also the final season for Ahearn Field House.

"I mostly remember Ahearn Field House. It didn't seem to matter who we played, it was always packed and we couldn't hear a thing," Richmond said. "It was a great experience for me to be in with a group of great guys, and it was a pleasure being a student at K-State. I miss all the guys I used to play with."

The 1988 Richmond-led Wildcats gave the fans quite an exciting season. K-State made its second-straight trip to the Big Dance, and was not to be eliminated before making the coveted final eight.

"I think that that was the time all the players on our team had to play. Everyone on our team elevated their play," Richmond said. "That is what it is all about, just making the NCAAs."

After his senior season, it was time to say goodbye to the wonderful state of Kansas, and hello to the golden state of California. Richmond became the fifth pick in the 1988 NBA draft, going to the Golden State Warriors.

Just try to imagine suiting up for an NBA basketball game, and getting ready to do battle with players you grew up watching and admiring.

"It was pretty scary. The only thing I can remember is that the lights were dim and the spotlight was on the guy singing the national anthem," Richmond said. "I was patting myself on the back that I had made it to the NBA. It was an unbelievable feeling."

That feeling was only a small part of what turned into one of the best rookie seasons the league has seen. The league named Richmond a unanimous choice as Rookie of the Year. Richmond made all purple and white fans swell with pride, and turned their professional support to Golden State.

"I didn't believe it at all," Richmond said. "A rookie usually has to sit on the bench and get adjusted to the NBA, but inside I thought I would be good and had confidence."

Look out, Richmond fan club, he said there is a lot more to come.

"I want to be known as a player that is mentioned with guys that are all-star caliber," Richmond said.

Track teams get win at meet in Lawrence

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

The K-State men's and women's track teams continued their trek through the indoor season by picking up a joint team victory Saturday in Lawrence at the Traveling Cup meet.

The meet featured a combined men's and women's team competition against conference foes University of Kansas and University of Missouri.

The K-State teams dominated the meet by winning 20 of the 31 events and outscoring the second-place KU teams by 60½ points.

Although K-State had the competition well in hand, Coach John Capriotti said the 160-point total score the team posted wasn't an accurate indicator of its performance.

"If you'd look at the overall score, it would seem like we had a great day," he said. "Our kids competed well, but to tell you the truth it wasn't that good of a day for us."

This meet, the second of the young indoor season, is traditionally very competitive, Capriotti said.

Due to the nature of the competition, he said he was pleased to win the meet.

"I'm glad we won," he said. "I tip my hat to the kids."

The teams' victory was aided by a good outing from the sprinters, Capriotti said.

This outing included a strong performance from Thomas Randolph, who won the 55-meter dash in 6.24, a provisionally qualifying time for the national indoor meet.

Two of the 20 victories came from All-Americans Angie Miller and Connie Teaberry, in the shot put and high jump respectively.

Capriotti said the team will continue to practice hard this week and set its sights on the Big Eight meet at the end of the indoor season.

"I don't want them to be satisfied with their times and distances this early. We've got a long way to go," he said.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Program sponsors soldiers

Gulf units adopted, receive encouragement

LAJEAN RAU
Collegian Reporter

If hours of network war coverage has left you wondering how much we really know about what is happening in the gulf, talking to the soldiers directly might give you a better picture.

Desert Partners is a program initiated by Steve Riese, Army captain and graduate student in industrial engineering.

It calls for businesses and organizations in the community to sponsor units serving in the Middle East, deployed from Fort Riley. This currently includes 110 units.

Riese announced the program the first week of December, about one month after the 1st Infantry Division, which accounts for most of the units, was deployed from Fort Riley.

The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce took up the idea, and Riese is now coordinating the program for the chamber.

"Having a link with the community back home is important for soldiers' morale," Riese said, "and the community has been quick to respond."

So far, 32 groups have adopted units, and new registrations are coming in daily.

Organizations can be matched up with units on the basis of similar interests.

Not only do the soldiers overseas benefit, but also the sponsoring groups.

"It really goes both ways," Riese said. "I have gotten nothing but positive response from groups who are participating right now, and the soldiers are just wild about it."

Two K-State groups, Delta Delta

Delta and the local chapter of the Institute of Industrial Engineers, were among the first to respond.

Riese went to the Student Government Association in mid-December to get them involved. SGA now facilitates campus groups wanting to participate.

In an informal survey before semester break, SGA found more than 25 groups interested in participating, but the timing was bad, with finals just days away, so promotion on campus did not start until the beginning of second semester.

"I know there is interest out there," said Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt. "It's just a matter of getting the word out."

Manhattan's response mirrors that of the entire country, which seems to be behind the soldiers to the point of overloading the system.

Riese said they have encountered some trouble with the mail.

Letters have been taking about 10 days to get to Saudi Arabia; small packages, about two weeks. He advised holding off on all large packages because of the backlog.

Commonly needed items include things as unexpected as pre-moistened towelettes.

"They get really dirty and grimy out in the desert," Riese said, "and the wipes are an easy way to clean up."

"Surprisingly, the soldiers enjoy simple letters most of all, he said. "They really like to hear someone talking to them."

Other popular items are music tapes, food, magazines and other things to read, he said.

"Hopefully after this week's meeting we will have each student senator involved somehow with Desert Partners," Heitschmidt said. "The best way for us to show support is to take the lead ourselves."

Stations change to support war effort

BETSY HIDALGO
Collegian Reporter

Local radio stations are supporting the war by playing special requests from what some call the silent soldiers — dependents of the men and women who are fighting in the Middle East.

Although most of the radio stations' programming has not changed, requests from the public include songs that have both pro and anti-war meanings.

"We are getting more requests from people who are missing someone overseas," said Jason Wright, program director of KMKF.

"We have been playing a lot of Journey's 'Faithfully,' and the requests for 'Now You're Messin' With a Son of a Bitch' by Nazareth has been getting a fair turn on the air," Wright said.

James Phelps, program director for KJCK FM, said he thinks the radio station's duties to the war are to promote a positive sense and to be upbeat.

New songs about the war have already made it on the air and more are soon to come.

"There will be a definite repercussion of Christian music about faith, hope and peace," said Phil Padilla, program director for KHCA.

Yoko Ono, Sean Lennon and Lenny Kravitz have formed the Peace Choir and released a remake of John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance."

Middle East books, maps popular items

MEREDITH T. JONES
Collegian Reporter

Literature on the Middle East has been popular lately in Manhattan, especially since the unit at Fort Riley was deployed. This has been the consensus of most of the bookstores in Manhattan.

An item that has virtually been sold out all over town are maps of the Middle East.

Kent Sylvius of Waldenbooks said, "Everybody's buying maps."

Bonnie Williams, trade book manager at Varney's Book Store, said 75 copies of one particular map have been sold. She said travel guides are also popular.

Nancy Matthews, owner of The Book Shop, said maps at her store have been sold out and it is hard for stores to get more.

Carole Chelz of Clafin Books & Copies said people want maps, but she has been unable to get any maps featuring only the Middle East.

But, Williams said publishers are now starting to publish enough maps to meet the demands of the people.

The big demand for literature of this type in this area started just recently.

Williams said, "When the Big Red One knew they were going over, that's when it started for us."

Rex Miller of Christian Books & Gifts said he noticed a change during December and the first couple of weeks in January. He said it started when the soldiers here were deployed.

Miller said small, compact Bibles and paperback Bibles were very popular and that he noticed a big increase in sales at that time.

He also said 12,000 copies of "The New Testament — Psalms and Proverbs" by the International Bible Society were sent to the Middle East with the 1st Infantry Division and were free to soldiers who wanted them.

Ann Schierling of Abundant Life Book Store also said she noticed an increase in Bible sales when the unit at Fort Riley was deployed. She said troops bought Bibles to take with them.

Sylvius said he has sold more of the "Koran," the sacred book of the Moslems, to troops going over.

Chelz said she has noticed an interest in Islamic religion.

Books on wars such as the Civil War, World War II and the Iran-Iraq War have also been of interest.

Sylvius said literature on tank battles has also been popular.

Books that have been very popular at The Book Shop are "Saddam Hussein and the Crisis in the Gulf" by Judith Miller and Laurie Mylroie and "Republic of Fear" by Samir al-Khalil.

Calm follows shock of gulf war

DAVE MCCULLAGH
Collegian Reporter

The initial shock of the war is over. Protests, counter-protests, shouting, pushing, shoving and marching have subsided and we are left with a relative calm during the desert storm.

"It's more relaxed now," said Tom Huslig, senior in physical education. "Things are getting back to normal."

Amber Brenzikofer, senior in landscape architecture, said the war is old news to her.

"There haven't been any major changes. But when the ground war starts things will heat up," she said.

As the war moves through its second week, student support is running high.

"I support it all the way," said Chris Barnett, freshman in accounting. "I have a friend who has been called to duty."

Students feelings are mixed about the protests and counter-protests. "The people protesting don't know what they're protesting," Barnett said. "I guess protesting seems like the thing to do in college."

Vincent Pruitt, sophomore in electrical engineering and U.S. Army veteran, said he thinks war protesters are in the minority.

"I don't think they understand what's going on. I don't understand the defacing of the Vietnam memorial on campus," he said.

Recent reports of harassment toward protesters has upset several students.

"I don't think people should threaten a person for protesting," said Brenzikofer. "It's your right as an American to protest or counter-protest — it's your freedom of speech."

Desert Storm protests denied fair coverage

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

There are some people on campus who think much of the Collegian's news coverage, as well as national coverage of the Persian Gulf crisis, has not covered war protests accurately.

These feelings escalated as a result of the Collegian's coverage of the anti-war protest that occurred in front of Seaton Hall Jan. 17.

The story that appeared in the Collegian focused on the conflict that occurred between two individuals near the end of the protest.

John Exdell, associate professor in philosophy and one of the organizers of the protest, said the Collegian seemed to ignore the fact that the protest was an intellectual event planned to express a group's point of view.

"There was an intellectual dimension to the event that was completely avoided," said Exdell. "The whole point of a demonstration is to get debate going; to bring people's attention to arguments and ideas.

"What the Collegian did was focus on the drama of the event. This tends to color the event as a shouting match between two belligerent sides who have nothing significant to say about the conflict," said Exdell.

Exdell said this type of coverage forces people to stop participating in such events.

Stan Cox, chairman of the Manhattan Alliance for Central America and also one of the organizers of the protest, said he was surprised this was the only thing covered by the Collegian.

"I was right in the middle of the rally and didn't even know that the conflict between the two people had happened," said Cox. "The conflict was sort of a side show and wasn't even the main focus of the protest."

Working class supports troops

Vets participate in march, hope to alleviate hostility

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

About 300 people chanted "U.S.A. — All the Way" as they marched peacefully through the snowy streets of Manhattan Saturday morning to show support for the troops in the Middle East.

The march, called the Working Class March, started in the southeast parking lot of the Manhattan Town Center and proceeded through downtown Manhattan and Aggieville to the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial on campus.

A service took place at the memorial, which included a prayer for the POWs and the troops. After the prayer, one woman yelled, "God bless America!"

Yellow ribbons were tied around arms and legs, on signs and flags. Small American flags were handed out to be waved. Big American flags and POW-MIA flags were carried. People had stickers with an American flag and a logo that read, "Kick Ass, U.S.A."

One T-shirt read, "Burn the JERKS...Not the FLAG."

Mike Dorton, owner of D's Army Surplus, which sells the shirt, said he was there to support the troops.

"If America doesn't support our kids, who's going to?" he said. "When we go to fight, we fight to win."

It was stressed this was not a demonstration, but a peaceful parade.

Deborah Martinez and Shannon Donoho were two of the marchers. Their husbands, both medics, are serving in the Middle East.

"The war's already started, so let's support them," Martinez said. "If we don't stop Saddam now, we may have to stop him in America."

One of the marchers, a nine-year-old boy, has 22 aunts and uncles serving in the Middle East.

Many of the participants in the march were Vietnam veterans, who wanted to give the troops the support they didn't get in Vietnam.

Cindy, a marcher who wished to not have her last name printed, said the march was a pro-support march to show that people are behind the troops, which she said was not the situation during the Vietnam war.

D.R. Ross, a Vietnam veteran and retired Sgt. 1st Class, said when the troops got back from Vietnam, their tires were slashed and they were called names, such as "murderer" and "baby killer."

He said he was ordered to go to and from work in civilian clothes, so he wouldn't provoke the anti-war protesters. He also said he was told to stay away from all types of crowds.

Ross said he was marching in gratitude.

"They're the ones who are saving us," he said.

"If protesters want to protest, they should have done it at the ballot box," Ross said. "Re-elect nobody, and vote 'em all out."

Bill, an ex-Navy man and a carrier of one of the POW-MIA flags, said the war was just.

"I believe in what they're fighting for," he said. "It's not oil, it's freedom."

Kenneth Breese, a Vietnam veteran who served in the Navy, said troops deserved and needed support.

"There are a lot of people in this country who use any excuse to put down this country," he said. "War is not glamorous at all — you die, you get crippled. Twenty years later, people are still feeling the effects of Vietnam."

Last year at the dedication of the Vietnam memorial, Breese said, "As long as the young and poor do the fighting and dying, nothing changes."

After the march, as the trailer was leaving, "U.S.A. — All the way" was chanted by the participants.

Then a lone man yelled, "That's what it's all about."

Collegian Reporter

If the majority of the audience left McCain Auditorium after the convocation lecture on Friday feeling dissatisfied, Randall Kennedy accomplished his goal.

Kennedy told his audience to be dissatisfied with the condition of race relations.

"We can't be satisfied with the way things are," Kennedy said.

Kennedy's lecture, "The Question of Group Rights," was part of the University's Martin Luther King Jr. Recognition Week.

Kennedy said the week was special because of many people's desire honor Martin Luther King Jr.

But he said he fears that despite the attention focused on King's birthday each year, people may lose sight of the meaning.

"All too few of us know all too little in particular about Dr. King and his contributions to society," King said.

He said the sharp edge of King's message is blunted. "Harmony is great as long as it's authentic," Kennedy said.

Kennedy said he feels King and his colleagues accomplished a great deal, but they shammed the country into passing civil rights acts, doing away with discrimination and voting limitations.

"Did he fully succeed in transforming for the better race relations in the United States?" Kennedy asked.

Kennedy said the answer is "No."

Kennedy also criticized Bush for limiting the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

Kennedy said he could sense a feeling of discomfort in the audience because of his comments about Bush.

"I don't take any great pleasure in criticizing harshly our president," Kennedy said.

"I think it's quite appropriate in the celebration that brings us here," he said.

Kennedy said King didn't flinch from making people uncomfortable.

"I don't think we should flinch from that either," he said.

Kennedy said Bush's veto of the Civil Rights Act of 1990 gives some sense of the political struggle with race relations.

Kennedy said everyone has to recognize the depth of the problem with racism. He said he feels a tremendous amount has been done, but more changes need to be made.

He said he saw a need for a magazine that would take a hard look at black politics, culture and society.

Daniel McKelway and Friends
Mozart: Music for Winds

Friday, February 1, 8 p.m.

Here's an antidote for Poison: Take two Mozart Serenades and the Overture to the Marriage of Figaro; sit back and enjoy.

Join Avery Fisher Career Award-winning clarinetist Daniel McKelway and a dozen of his friends for an evening of wind music that will show you why Salieri was so jealous of Mozart.

With student prices 1/2 what the general public pays, a ticket to Mozart is just what the doctor ordered.

Senior Citizens: $13.00
General Public: $15.00 coverage and, Lee Greenwood's "God Bless the U.S.A." also has inserts.

Mike Tema, program director for KQLA, said their approach is different from other radio stations because employees are reviewing their format looking for songs with a lot of meaning.

"We are consciously aware of war-type songs and incorporate them into our programming," he said.

The Christian radio station KHCA, as well as other local radio stations, increased their news coverage when the war broke out by broadcasting hourly reports.

KQLA and KMKF are two radio stations that are doing even more.

They are helping the community while the nation is at war.

KMKF handed out desert survival kits before the Big Red One left for the Middle East and they also take part in Project Manhattan Cares.

"This program helps the dependents of the military overseas in a variety of ways," said Wright.

KQLA gives a list of deployed Fort Riley soldiers who want a pen pal to Gregg Rhame who then gives the addresses to the public. Rhame started the pen pal program and KQLA promotes it.

"We received 800 soldiers' names from Rhame, and within 10 days all 800 were taken," Tema said. "The soldiers requested pen pal support before they left, and hopefully we will receive more names."

had already demonstrated a willingness to use.

In another area, Slattery said the potential dissolution of the Soviet Union threatened world peace even more than the present war — if breakaway republics were to control nuclear weapons.

At the same time, Slattery said he rejects the claim of the Soviet Union on the Baltic republics. A delicate balance must be maintained in negotiations with the Soviet Union to gain the Baltic republics' independence without destabilizing the rest of the country.

"If there is a ground offensive, it will be important to stop that before we are able to extend our range to the occupation of Iraq," he said. "If we go on to occupy Iraq, the Vietnam War that Bush has promised us not to deliver again will be our future for a very long time. We'll be fighting rebellious elements against our occupation of Iraq indefinitely."

Insurgencies in a U.S.-occupied Iraq, combined with the withdrawal of America's Arab partners in the coalition as a result of such guerrilla actions in their own countries, would lead the United States to withdraw from Iraq in the same way it withdrew from Vietnam, Ellsberg said.

At the White House, a line of Washington, D.C., police officers blocked the sidewalk in front of the White House.

The police officers, equipped with riot helmets, gas masks and tear-gas grenades, stood behind a row of white police cars parked bumper to bumper in front of the White House sidewalk.

At least one marcher thought the police presence was solely to intimidate the marchers.

Gene Seminero, a Korean War veteran and unemployed construction worker from New Jersey, said he had never seen so many police in 30 years of Washington demonstrations.

"It's the new order," Seminero said. "That's his new world order. It smacks of facism. They're definitely afraid of people. They're definitely afraid of the truth. ... They're deliberately managing the press. ... They're showing us when they hit what they want to hit, but they're not showing us when they hit civilian population. And we have to pick up the price."

"I fought in Korea. Forty years ago. If I had to do it over again, I would go to Canada. We were used. We were kids. We thought we were heroes. We were just used. It never ends, it never ends. Different places, different times, different faces," he said.

"You try to get help, to get a job. I haven't worked in two months. There's no work. And they have money for bombs. It's sickening. ... No money for tuition. Since I've been out of work, I've had to spend every last penny I have on my daughter's tuition. She goes to Boston University. This year tuition is up to $21,600. A year. And you can't get a penny aid from the government. ... The priorities. It's disgraceful," Seminero said.

Many of the signs and banners carried in the march called upon the government to halt the war and use the money for social spending.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson questioned the sincerity of Bush's rhetoric about the war.

In a speech at the Ellipse that drew loud cheers and was interrupted by applause several times, Jackson said, "President Bush, like you, we love our troops. We love them when they are not troops. We must build a nation with affordable housing and education and health care. We must abandon the war on poverty and the war on drugs. These wars continue to rage, and the thousand points of light that promised to illuminate them are now without batteries. We can't just have 180-degree part-time love for our youth. We must have 360-degree full-time love for our children, in uniform or out of uniform."

Jackson also called on Bush to sign the Civil Rights Bill of 1991 to benefit the minorities who "serve on the front lines disproportionate to their numbers."

Other speakers at the rally questioned why force is being used against Iraq when the Soviet Union is cracking down on the Baltic republics, the People's Republic of China has repressed democracy, and apartheid continues in South Africa.

About 200 counter-demonstrators chanted their support for the war in Lafayette Park across the street from the White House during the march.

What is the pH level of post-rigor beef?

Although this question probably won't be heard on any of the TV game shows, it might be heard today or Jan. 30 and 31 at the animal science and industry "quadrathlon."

Ernie Minton, associate professor of animal sciences and industry, is the coordinator for the four-part contest.

"The contest consists of a laboratory practical, testing the student's practical animal agriculture skills; a written exam, including questions from all levels of animal sciences; an oral presentation on a current topic; and a quiz bowl — a game-show styled event," Minton said.

"It's a fun opportunity to teach and reinforce classroom topics in a relaxed, informal setting," he said.

The students gain practical skills while they receive one hour of credit for their effort, Minton said.

Iran gives Iraqi planes right to land aircraft during war

Official hints agreement may have been reached between former Persian Gulf rivals

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The Pentagon shrugged off arguments Monday for hunting down Iraq's top-of-the-line aircraft seeking refuge in Iran, contending the warplanes are not a high-priority target that threaten allied forces.

Lt. Gen. Thomas Kelly, the Pentagon spokesman for Operation Desert Storm, said 80 Iraqi planes have sought haven in Iran and 60 of those appear to be late models such as French-made Mirage F-1s, and Soviet-made MiG-29s and MiG-25s.

"They're putting the flower of their air force out," Kelly told reporters at a Pentagon briefing.

The general said allied war planners weren't exactly sure of the motives behind the movement.

It was clear, the general said, that Iran was allowing the planes to land, and he hinted that perhaps some kind of agreement had been reached between the once-hostile neighbors.

"It could be a plan to save those aircraft for another time, to include during this conflict or after this conflict. I don't know what kind of arrangements Iraq has reached with Iran," Kelly said.

The general said the planes have departed Iraq piecemeal, as well as in organized groups, which may indicate some coordination among the pilots.

He said, however, it was clear that Iran so far has stood by its pledge to remain neutral and impound the aircraft.

Secretary of State James A. Baker III said in a separate meeting with reporters, "Through diplomatic channels we received assurances that the aircraft would be kept in Iran, that Iran was maintaining its position of complete neutrality in this conflict."

This removes them as a threat to allied aircraft, Kelly said, adding that it appeared to do the aircraft little good to fly to a country that had no spare parts or maintenance crews for them. And grounded aircraft "begin to break after a time" without maintenance, he said.

"So I don't think it's a good deal" that would help Saddam retain a portion of his air force, Kelly said.

The general argued that the reason the planes were leaving was clear because the allies have had great success in seeking out the hardened bunkers where most of Saddam's more than 700 combat aircraft are hidden lest they be shot out of the air.

"They'll either be destroyed on the ground or in the air," Kelly said.

But the general and other Pentagon spokesmen insisted that while they remained concerned about the movement of the warplanes, it isn't necessary, nor even immediately possible, for allied aircraft to mount an all-out hunt for them.

Suicide leaves lasting effects

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Two K-State students have committed suicide in the last two months.

What they left behind for the people who knew and were close to them will probably have lasting effects for years to come, said David Balk, assistant professor in human development.

"Most people have difficulty dealing with blame and guilt. They feel somehow responsible for what happened and it is difficult for the person to come to terms with the fact that someone they care about committed suicide," Balk said.

Often, the surviving friends or family of a suicide victim will feel guilty for not reading the signs or knowing the person was in trouble. They begin to blame themselves for not doing something to help the person. But oftentimes, said Karl Laves, psychology intern who works as a counselor at Lafene, the signs may not be there to read.

"When anything horrible happens to us, we somehow think we are involved. People assume they didn't see the warning signs but sometimes there aren't any warning signs at all," Laves said. "People aren't experts. They can't expect to know everything."

Parents may also experience shame that their son or daughter committed suicide, Laves said. They aren't sure what to say when talking to people about the death.

"Society is still at a place where there is a stigma connected to suicide. People who become aware of the suicide think, 'They must have been nuts,' when we know that isn't the case," Laves said. "The family may hold back the grieving process because they feel ashamed."

Balk said anger at being left behind to deal with these feelings, as well as shame and guilt can slow down the grieving process to the point of blocking it out completely.

"Grief over suicide will last as long as the anger is there. Those who do not come to terms with how angry they are will never heal," he said. "It will fester in them and come out in odd ways if those emotions are stuffed away."

The emotional responses to burying feelings vary from individual to individual and really can't be predicted, Balk said. The method to dealing with the death now, however, is talking about the feelings being experienced.

"Find ways to use friends for support," Balk said. "Admit that you are really hurting."

Balk said it is important for people to be willing to listen.

"The biggest problem for those

AWOL doctor will surrender to authorities

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

An Army Reserve doctor AWOL from a medical-evaluation hospital deployed to Saudi Arabia, said Saturday in Washington, D.C., she will surrender to authorities at Fort Riley later this week.

Capt. Yolanda Huet-Vaughn said at a Washington anti-war march she is AWOL because she could not be part of a military operation that is risking great numbers of casualties.

"I'm here to serve the troops," Huet-Vaughn said. "They deserve to have people in power, their commanders, who care about their welfare."

"From a medical perspective, we're not prepared to handle the casualties that will result from this war. In Vietnam ... we could evacuate maybe 200 per day. In this scenario (Iraq), we're talking about maybe 200 wounded per hour. There is just no way, once this ground war starts, that we're going to be able to move those helicopters in to move them out. They're just going to have to leave people in the sand to die," Huet-Vaughn said.

"As a physician, how can I tell people, 'Look, it's OK, you can go to war, we'll be able to take care of it?'" she said. "The military and the president are willing to sacrifice literally thousands and thousands of American men and women. For what?"

"I can't do that. I cannot be part of that. It's very distressing and anguishing to me," Huet-Vaughn said. Mark Mescke, public information officer for Fort Riley, said Huet-Vaughn's unit, the 410th Medical Evacuation Hospital from Topeka deployed Sunday for Operation Desert Storm.

"They all have left as of yesterday," Mescke said Monday. "Right now we don't have her. She's still AWOL."

Mescke said Huet-Vaughn has not applied for conscientious objector status, but did object to going to Saudi Arabia.

UFM examining outside funding possibilities

Past, anticipated budget reductions has director looking at non-University sources

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

After being threatened with the loss of funding from K-State twice in the last year, UFM is looking elsewhere for funding sources.

Linda Teener, executive director of UFM, said for the fiscal year of July 1, 1990 to June 30, 1991, the University administration cut the funding it provides UFM from about $34,000 to $24,000. In the spring of 1990, UFM almost lost its funding from Student Senate as well.

She said UFM is anticipating further reductions next year, but the amount is unknown at this time. University Provost James Coffman said it is a question of where UFM funding should come from.

"UFM does a lot of good things, and it plays an important role in the community," he said. "The issue gets to be more a matter of determining who should properly pay for what."

The administration wants to gradually reduce the amount of funding it gives to UFM, but does not yet have any definite guidelines for doing so, Coffman said.

Teener said she understands the University's position.

"We appreciate the support that we get and hope that the University will continue to work with us in meeting campus needs," she said. "UFM is doing everything it can to become as self-sufficient as possible."

UFM will hold a chili feed, a used-book sale and the annual direct-mail fund drive to raise money this semester, Teener said.

In addition, she said she is considering adding another large fundraiser in the fall.

"We are looking at every opportunity to increase our private funding sources," Teener said. "And, we appreciate the support and the time that the University is giving us to do that."

UFM is also working to increase student awareness at K-State of classes it has available to them. Free classes designed for students include subjects from how to use the library to how to fill out a 1040 short-form for income taxes, she said.

To increase student involvement in the types of classes offered, UFM developed a student-program council to look at students' needs and interests, Teener said.

She said UFM is also trying to increase the amount of its advertising as well as improving the types of classes offered.

Quad contest in 1st stage

BETH J. GAINES
Collegian Reporter

A written exam and laboratory practical started the ninth annual Animal Sciences and Industry Quadrathlon Monday night.

The four-part contest at Weber Hall, which includes 14 teams, tries to measure practical skills for students interested in animal agriculture.

Randel Raub, chairman of the written exam, said the 80 question exam often gives younger students a hard time because they have not had enough classroom time.

"Many of those students said they remembered the information being covered in class, but couldn't remember the material," he said.

Joe Hancock, chairman of the laboratory practical, said it is designed to test the student's knowledge on skills they will be expected to use once they graduate.

"The practical is divided into eight stations," Hancock said. "Those include beef, swine, sheep, poultry, equine, meats, dairy products and feedstuffs."

The different stations are set up by animal science faculty whose specialty lies within that particular area, Hancock said.

Diversification is the key to winning this contest, and many teams have members with different areas of specialization, he said.

The stations varied on levels of difficulty. Some also required the team to split up in order to get finished in the allotted 12 minutes.

The beef station was one such example. The stop included both management decisions and the knowledge of practical skills. Teams were asked to answer questions about herd mating to match a given scenario, in addition to correctly artificially inseminating a cow.

The feedstuff station was unique to the practical because there were not any livestock directly involved, only the ingredients

Bush postpones summit meeting

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush, troubled about a long trip to Moscow in the midst of the Persian Gulf War as well as bogged-down talks over a strategic arms reduction treaty, decided Monday to put off his scheduled Feb. 11-13 summit with Mikhail Gorbachev.

The decision was by mutual agreement with the Kremlin, and the summit will be rescheduled in Moscow at "a later date in the first half of this year," according to a joint statement of Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Soviet Foreign Minister Alexander Bessmertnykh.

Bush met with Bessmertnykh just prior to the announcement. It was the first time that a scheduled U.S.-Soviet summit had been put off since the late Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev canceled President Dwight D. Eisenhower's 1959 visit to Moscow in furious objection to U.S. spy flights over Soviet territory.

But the postponement of the Bush-Gorbachev meeting "was a mutual decision so there is no disappointment," Bessmertnykh emphasized.

Standing together in a White House driveway, Bessmertnykh first in Russian and then Baker in English read their joint statement.

Noriega denied drug case dismissal

MIAMI (AP) — A federal judge Monday rejected the defense's call to throw out Manuel Noriega's drug case, ruling the deposed Panamanian leader's rights had not been jeopardized by government taping of his prison phone calls.

The defense had asked U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler to dismiss the indictment on grounds of government misconduct.

Noriega's attorneys accused the prosecution of improperly recording calls between their client and their office, one of which was later leaked and telecast by CNN.

But prosecutors responded that Noriega had signed documents acknowledging his calls were being monitored and taped.

State unemployment rate increases

TOPEKA — The state's unemployment rate inched up 0.3 percent in December to 4.6 percent, the Department of Human Resources said in a report released Monday.

While there was an increase in employment over the year, state officials are concerned about the increasing number of jobless people in Kansas.

Students send Bush hope message

WASHINGTON (AP) — A group of Kansas elementary school students has sent a message of hope and peace about the Persian Gulf War to President Bush and members of Congress.

The message was an origami, or folded-paper, crane. One was sent to every member of the House and Senate and to the president.

Origami is a Japanese art of folding paper into shapes, such as animals and flowers.

Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Wichita, mailed the cranes last week on behalf of a class at McCandless Elementary School in Hutchinson.

"As we begin the second week of war in the Persian Gulf, all we can do is voice support for our troops and hope this conflict is resolved quickly and with little loss of life," Glickman said in a letter to his colleagues that explained the cranes.

The class, made up of students with behavior disorders, made 1,000 paper cranes after reading a book, "Sadako and 1,000 Paper Cranes."

Here is the text of a letter by the children, which Glickman enclosed in his mailing:

"We the members of the Level II Behavior Disordered Classroom, McCandless Grade School, Hutchinson, Kansas, present these 1,000 cranes to you as a symbol of hope. Hope that the Middle East situation will be handled in the most effective way so that we may attain a more peaceful world.

"In Japan, the cranes symbolize good luck. A 12-year-old girl by the name of Sadako believed the legend of the cranes would cure her of leukemia which she contracted as a result of the bomb at Hiroshima. We have read and studied of her faith. We pass on to you our faith and hope as well as support for the future. We pray that these cranes will serve as a reminder for hope. We are children, but one day will be the future."

Students cautioned about measles

A red alert has been raised at Lafene Health Center concerning measles.

Last Wednesday a student who appeared to have measles reported to Lafene for treatment, Dr. Larry Moeller said. Test results confirming this diagnosis won't be available until next week.

Meanwhile, Moeller urges students be vaccinated if they fall into the following categories:

- They were vaccinated for measles before 15 months of age;
- they were born between 1963 and 1967; or
- they were born after 1957 but never got a measles vaccine.

Students exhibiting measles symptoms should seek care at Lafene promptly. Preliminary symptoms include a flu-like syndrome with fever, headache, aching muscles and sometimes red eyes that are sensitive to bright light.

Hallmark signs of measles develop after the first symptoms. They include a rash that starts at the scalp and can spread to the entire body, and white spots in the mouth, inside the cheeks called Koplik's spots.

Students display variety of artwork

A display of student scholarship recipients' artwork is on display through Jan. 31 in Gallery 6 of the Art Building.

Among the pieces on display are charcoal drawings, ceramics, metalwork and paintings.

A committee selected the students for the scholarships and the show in the fall after reviewing portfolios of all the entrants.

John O'Shea, assistant professor of art, said the committee is composed of five faculty members in the various areas of the art department.

O'Shea said the competition is open to all art students, and awards range from $250 to $1000.

Deni Randel, sophomore in painting, is one of the artists whose work is on display.

"Hopefully, it inspires other students to apply for scholarships and do better work," Randel said.

Randel also said the show gives other people a chance to see what art students are doing.

Classroom gives former dean joy

S. KATHERINE DIETRICH
Science/Health Reporter

What do a New York state farm house and Manhattan Town Center have in common?

The answer is Bernd Foerster. Once dean of the College of Architecture and Design, Foerster is now a professor in the college.

"It's my life," he said of teaching, happy to be in the classroom full-time after 15 years as an administrator.

As dean and professor, his interests have exceeded the bounds of the K-State campus.

Although his interests have been varied, they have a common theme: the quality of life for community residents.

Foerster said he believes that feeling connected to one's environment is the key to a quality life.

His involvements are geared toward helping people find those connections. For instance, he co-founded the Land Institute, an agency that promotes ecologically sound, rural initiatives.

The connecting idea is people are responsible for the land and the large environment around them.

Foerster said he believes people are also responsible for their smaller, community environments. Historic preservation is one way he expresses a connection to his community.

Historic preservation was really a movement begun by little old ladies in tennis shoes with blue hair, his colleague, James Fitch, told him.

Convinced that the lay people sometimes know better than the professionals, Foerster published a pioneering book on historic preservation in 1965.

In "Architecture Worth Saving - Rensselaer County, New York" he suggested that buildings in the county be saved from destruction regardless of their function.

The farm houses, industrial buildings, and workers' dwellings were as important to save, he believed, as the mansions and historical landmarks.

This marked a new concept in the young field of historic preservation in the United States. Saving buildings of importance to the common citizen had not been widely practiced.

By preserving such structures, Foerster said he believed that the community would gain a sense of heritage and importance. The average citizen could take pride in and identify with the community.

And with a little civic spirit, he postulated that residents might develop or resurrect economic development and cultural life that enhances a community's livability.

"Improvement," Foerster said, "is just as catching as neglect."

After publication of his book, Foerster was appointed to chair the Governor's Advisory Committee on Historic Preservation in New York. A generation later, in Manhattan, Kansas, he continues to promote community improvement through historic preservation activities.

Promoting his ideal community is harder at home than if he is called in as an expert in another community.

"The farther away (I travel), the better they listen," he said.

Also the struggle to promote aesthetics often puts him at odds with government officials or businesses. That means selling a concept of quality to people that only speak the language of quantity.

"What is the value of a sunset? How much for a mother-in-law?" Foerster posed these questions to demonstrate that some things in life can't be measured with yardsticks and dollar amounts.

Yet Foerster has seen successes in his local attempts to maintain a quality community in Manhattan.

Dave Mayes/Staff

Professor and former dean of architecture, Bernd Foerster, has a unique filing system dominating the wall behind his desk in his office in Seaton. He chaired an advisory board that ensured the look of old Manhattan was incorporated into the Manhattan Town Center. Below: Foerster files the slides he uses for his classes in boxes marked with medallions he creates by painting enamel designs onto copper disks.

He chaired Manhattan's Downtown Redevelopment Advisory Board when it was determining the location of the Manhattan Town Center.

Developers wanted a shopping mall. Foerster and other citizens wanted community aesthetics maintained.

To keep the look of old Manhattan, two historic buildings were incorporated in the construction of the mall complex. The mall itself was designed to fit in with the limestone structures that originally made up downtown.

The result is a mall that is "quite unique" according to Foerster, compared to similar structures in other communities. He said it escaped the "homogenizing influences" that might have made it look like any other mall in any other town.

His concerns continue today with possibility of rezoning older neighborhoods in Manhattan.

Clearing the way for high-density housing development is counter to community spirit, he said.

His local activism has been augmented by national involvement in historic preservation. For nine years, he has served on the board of trustees for the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

The National Trust is the only national organization dedicated to historic preservation. Foerster was the first and only Kansan to serve on the board of trustees, and one of the few academicians.

Having served the maximum number of years allowed, the board of trustees designated him a trustee emeritus late last year.

McCain promotes activities

LISA NOLL
Collegian Reporter

Organizing a dinner theater, sponsoring a living group theme dinner and promoting McCain productions are just a few of the activities the McCain Student Development Council is involved in this year.

The council, consisting of 20 K-State students, is designed to promote and encourage knowledge and appreciation of the McCain Performance Series.

Each year a list of prospective entertainers is brought before the council. The members help decide who will perform at K-State.

"It gives the students the ability to have a say in who comes to K-State as far as big-time productions go," said Bryan Johnson, junior in marketing and hotel and restaurant management and council president.

This semester the council is sponsoring a dinner theater on Feb. 24 in correlation with Neil Simon's comedy "Rumors."

The evening includes dinner for two at Clyde's restaurant and two tickets to the production. The package is $40 per couple and will be limited to about 50 couples.

John Riley, assistant director of agricultural resident instruction and adviser for the council, said the ticket prices for students have been decreased because of the Fine Arts/Athletics fee included in tuition. Corporate donors also help to keep the price of the tickets low.

Because of the low cost, Riley feels the ticket purchasing has increased.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Evidence gathered in several surveys of the student body indicates that a high proportion of students on the K-State campus have lost a friend or a family member in the past 12 months.

Dr. David Balk in the Department of Human Development and Family Studies has been given funds to conduct a two-year study of college students who are coping with the death of a friend or family member. The first part of this study occurred in the Fall Semester of 1990.

Dr. Balk is looking for 80 students who are still grieving a death of a friend or family member. He is also looking for 40 other students who are not bereaved over a death and who would be willing to take part in a companion research study on coping with stress in college life.

The project will begin in early February. Arrangements are underway to provide one hour of course credit for persons who would like credit for participating in the research project.

For further information contact Dr. David Balk, Justin Hall 318, 532-5510.

EDITORIAL

President, protesters should put sock in it

Here it is, at long last, by popular request, my opinion on the war. I debated myself at great length about whether or not to write this puppy. I figured it was either have everybody think I was shallow for not writing about it, or have no one read this week's column because they really don't want to hear any more opinions about the war. I kind of feel that way myself. But I don't want to be shallow, and I do have an opinion. So, I thought I'd toss this one out and see what happens.

I'm pro-war. I don't like the sound of that particularly. I prefer "in favor of the action in the Persian Gulf," or some other such phrase. But if those who oppose the whole gulf situation can be broadly labeled "anti-war," then, I suppose I have to say I'm pro-war. I don't think that's fair, really. I mean, if you think about it, everybody's anti-war. I don't know many people who can honestly say "Yes, I favor death and destruction. I'm particularly fond of the inevitable slaughter of innocent people." It's like going into McDonald's and ordering a McDead Cow Slice. There are times when euphemisms are necessary.

What we have, really, are people who understand the necessity of our actions in the gulf and support them, people who think we're "fighting for oil" and can't support that and people who can't support war under any circumstances, no matter how necessary it may seem. There are also, of course, the people who just agree with whomever they're talking to.

I can understand and sympathize with the pure pacifists. I know where they're coming from. In this case, however, somebody would be fighting in the Persian Gulf, no matter what our country had done. As far as I can tell, somebody nearly always is. So if you're a pacifist, I guess you just have to decide whether that only applies to your own country getting involved, or anybody who might be fighting. If it applies to everyone equally, then I would think you'd have to support our involvement. Involvement that seems likely to end the war in a shorter time frame than if we'd left it alone. After all, it was too late to prevent some kind of war the minute Hussein invaded Kuwait. I would think the a true pacifist would want to protest Saddam Hussein himself.

But there are still a pack of people who protest because they think we're fighting for oil, and they're the ones I really disagree with. Let's pretend that that's how you feel, and I'll answer your questions or accusations.

Protester: We're sending people to die fighting for oil companies' profit margins.

Me: We're sending people to fight for our economy. If we left the whole situation alone, and a madman suddenly controlled over half the world's oil supply, we could face a depression worse than anything seen in the 1930s. Ask your grandparents if that's not worth fighting for. It's definitely time to start looking for things to replace oil in our way of life, but it isn't just a question of not putting gas in your car until there's an alternative. It's a question of freezing to death and possibly starving as well.

Karin Dell'Antonia

Collegian Columnist

Protester: We should have given sanctions enough time to work.

Me: Many estimates say that Iraq may have nuclear capability in as little as six months. Do you want to wait for that?

Let's say that at this point President Bush comes in and wants to get into the discussion.

President Bush: Besides, we cannot allow Hussein to invade the freedom of the people of Kuwait! We must stand up for their right to choose their own way of life.

Me: Put a sock in it, Mr. President. (People who actually believe this is why we're fighting frighten me. I met one a few weeks ago. I don't think they should be allowed to run around loose. They, so obviously, aren't living in the real world.) If that was why we got into this we should have had to fight Israel over the Gaza Strip a long time ago, not to mention all the trouble involved in fighting ourselves for interfering in Panama and countless other countries. We'd have had to divide the army up into red and blue teams and battled it out. The news media would have been hugely confused, but the protesters could have had a heyday.

I've been wanting to tell President Bush to blow it out his, um, nose for months now. I think he's taking the right course of action, and I'm sure he knows why he's doing it. So do millions of Americans who haven't been living with their head in their, um, glass of soda pop for the last few decades.

We're fighting for our economy, our way of life. We're fighting because we're afraid of what Hussein could do if he got enough territory, enough oil and enough power. We're fighting for a region that has become, however unwisely, our lifeline, and that is something we can't afford to see laid to waste by a man who has no interest in America's interests. We're not fighting for the rights of a small country that was never a democracy in the first place. I think a little honesty would be a real nice thing to hear from the president right now.

I have one more problem with Persian Gulf War protesters. Saddam Hussein's only chance for not losing this war, short of figuring out how to nuke New York (in which case nobody wins), is to convince the American public to put enough pressure on the government to force it to withdraw our forces. With us out of the picture, he might be able to do enough damage to Israel to convince a few Muslim countries to join his side. This is the man who's killed members of his own family for disagreeing with his policies. This is the man who's already committed what may be the biggest environmental atrocity of our time—the killing of the Persian Gulf itself. Despite what we feel and what we're fighting for, he must be stopped.

I'm not sure it's any of our business either, but it has to be somebody's business. I'm proud that most Americans consider it a responsibility we're glad to take on.

Editorials

Expression of our freedoms does not include invasion

Since the outbreak of the Persian Gulf War, we have heard opposition to the war, prayers for peace, chants for the war and support for the troops in the Middle East.

Since we live in America, everyone is entitled to their own opinions about the war. But while Americans are expressing these opinions, they often don't think and go too far.

People's actions — both locally and nationally — have been spontaneous, and spontaneity often has undesirable consequences.

The vandalism to the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial caused Vietnam veterans to confront protesters at Union Plaza. The confrontation drew attention away from the protest and the issues being disputed. Ironically, the protest was for peace.

Arab-Americans throughout the United States have been receiving an increased number of bomb threats to their homes, schools and offices. These threats and other actions alienate the rights of all Americans.

People need to think about their actions before acting. Freedom of expression about the war is important to all Americans, but expressing opinions does not mean invading others' rights.

Another perspective

At a time when the eyes of the world are focused on the Middle East, disturbing things are occurring in the Baltic Republics. While the network news reports on the "Stealth Fighters" bombarding Iraqi airstrips, Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev is directing a "Stealth Police Action" against the rebellious republics.

Gorbachev's apparent shift to the right is disturbing. It is not clear whether this shift is the result of pressure from the Kremlin Old Guard, or if Gorbachev's tactics have changed as a result of changes in his personal philosophy, but either way people are dying.

As Oleg Bogomolov, director of the Institute for World Socialist Economies, has stated, and we tend to agree, "The Brezhnev doctrine of limited sovereignty ... introduced during the military intervention in Czechoslovakia in 1968 has been reanimated and is being used inside our country."

It seems Gorbachev is trying to institute sweeping economic changes with one hand while snuffing democratic resistance with the other.

Although Gorbachev has been a good friend, possibly the best friend the United States has ever had in the Kremlin, we need to accept the fact that he is not quite the godsend some have come to believe. One also needs to consider that no matter how charismatic a Soviet leader is, he has not all the reigns of power firmly in his hands.

In light of these events in Lithuania, we need to re-evaluate the U.S. relationship with Gorbachev and the Soviet Union. Both food aid and economic aid to the Soviet Union are important to the Soviet leaders, and perhaps these can be used as tools to modify the policy towards the Baltic states. It is also possible that changes can be precipitated via U.S. cooperation with Boris Yeltsin — Gorbachev's main adversary.

— Iowa State Daily
January 22, 1991

Believe it or not, being a native born Kansan does have some advantages. Primary among these is the ability to wear hats advertising various farm machinery dealers and still have friends and family take you seriously. I like this.

But there are problems. In these troubled times, people sometimes need to get away and relax. Even college students, who have Aggieville every weekend, sometimes find ourselves in a rut. We need to get out and hit that wide open highway to paradise even if only for the weekend.

Therein lies a problem. A large number of people believe Kansas is no paradise. Some even see it on a level slightly below that of hell. "A cultural wasteland devoid of any scenery and full of inbred people," are some of the petty complaints that cross my ears.

So in this mistaken belief that Kansas has nothing to do, people flee the state in haste every weekend. They run west toward the Rockies on ski trips paid for with newly issued credit cards. North and East they head to spend student loan checks, gambling on horse and dog races. South they — no wait. No one ever goes to Oklahoma unless a relative dies.

Yet, all of this travel in an attempt to escape is totally unnecessary. Kansas is a wonderland, both day and night, with lots to do and see. So what follows are a few weekend trips designed to both rejuvenate your creative juice and prove that Kansas truly is the "Land of Ah's."

The next time you've got that "Born to be Wild" urge flowing through your body, why not set forth for Cawker City? For in Cawker City, there awaits a sight that everyone should see at least once. The world's largest ball of twine.

Needless to say, the ball is an awe-inspiring sight. The kind of sight in fact that makes people utter such prophetic statements as "Gee, that's a pretty big ball of twine," after seeing it. To think of the time, the tears and the sheer stupidity of the effort, one can only marvel.

Like all good tourist attractions, there's also a certain amount of controversy associated with what I like to call, "The Ball." It seems a town in Minnesota is challenging Cawker City's world's largest claim by building a bigger and better ball of twine. If successful, it would lower Cawker City to the position of having what is only the world's second largest ball of twine. This would be a blow that might never be recovered from.

Shawn Bruce

But I wouldn't worry. I'm sure those brave Cawker Citizens will do whatever they have to do to keep the world's largest ball of twine honor right here in Kansas where it belongs. Somebody still cares.

Another trip you might want to consider is to the world's largest hand-dug well in Greensburg. This is basically a large hole in the ground that has been turned into a tourist attraction. Though not as awe inspiring as an enormous ball of twine, the well is quite large. In fact, tourists from as far away as Nebraska have been heard to utter such comments as "Gee, that's a pretty big well."

One of the other nice things about the Big Well sight is the wonderful gift shop. Selling such items as squirt guns, cigarettes and other items related to engineering, they give one a new perspective on the American tourist. Make sure on your way out, you pick up a whoopee cushion for me.

As the summer months arrive, consider hitting one of the numerous county fairs in the state. County fairs are truly exciting events. For instance, the fair in my home county (which shall remain nameless) had such exciting events as turtle racing, pig wrestling and a talent show in which local people proved why they don't belong in Hollywood. One year, they even had goat tying (which I would have won had the judge's son not been competing).

County fairs are also known for wonderful food. This is not necessarily true. It's actually a myth perpetuated by ladies auxiliary units of the local VFW who charge exorbitant prices for sloppy joes and homemade pie. As you're eating, try and remember that you're experiencing small town life at it's best, rather than the fact that you just paid $2.50 for a piece of apple pie that's been sitting on a table uncovered for six hours.

There's a lot of "Kodak moments" at a county fair, too. The touching sight of a 4-H'er making sure her pig is spic and span clean before taking it before the judge. The nervous look on both the pig's and the 4-H'er's face as they compete. The joy and relief they both feel after winning that blue ribbon. The frightened look on the animal's face as it is sold to slaughter the next night.

The month of September brings the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson. This is usually the highlight of the year for me. I can't begin to give a complete overview of the fair's events, but some of my personal favorite things to do are go look at the 2,000-pound butter cow and then try to find a carnival worker who actually speaks English.

Those of you who prefer a little more action in your State Fair activities won't be disappointed either. Start your day on the midway by watching carnival workers get arrested on various drug charges. Later on, go to the stock car races and have permanent hearing damage inflicted upon yourself.

For the truly brave, there is one more event. Though it's not for everyone, I see it as a reflection of what Kansas is. It is (drumroll please) the combine demolition derby.

Combine demolition derbies are exactly like car demolition derbies except, as implied by the title, combines are used. The last one left running is the winner. He or she receives a new hat.

What better way to spend a September afternoon than by watching farmers, loaded on cheap bourbon, attempt to demolish each other in "threshing machines of death." Especially when you realize the NFL won't have started yet.

There you have it. A short list of possible trips to take you from now until the first month of fall semester. Remember too, that this is just a beginning. Adventure waits, if not over the next hill, then just down a long flat road surrounded by wheat and sky. There's a certain kind of beauty in that. Just remember to linger longer.

New lab test detects yeast

S. KATHERINE DIETRICH
Health/Science Reporter

A highly accurate lab test developed by K-State researchers could make detection of a major human pathogen nearly foolproof.

Daniel Y.C. Fung, professor of food science, and Chao Liang, graduate student in food science, are researchers in the field of rapid-methods testing. They seek faster, more accurate ways of detecting micro-organisms in clinical, food and industrial settings.

Fung and Liang have discovered a rapid-methods test for Candida albicans. Candida is a common cause of human infection. Many women are familiar with the discomfort of vaginal yeast infections caused by Candida. The yeast can have more devastating effects, however, on persons with weakened immune systems.

Capable of invading any cavity or tissue in the human body, Candida can seriously threaten health in infants, elderly and those infected with the AIDS virus. It is the most common manifestation of HIV infection.

Patients with AIDS or other immune system disorders can be infected with a number of pathogens.

Pathogens are agents that cause diseases. Candida is one such micro-organism.

"Rapid identification of Candida is important," Fung said, so medical professionals can begin correct treatment as soon as possible.

This rapid-methods test uses a dye-containing growth medium that marks Candida as it grows. After exposing the medium to ultraviolet radiation, the pathogen is visible under fluorescent light.

Organic dyes have long been used in diagnostic microbiology to separate different species by color. What distinguishes this test is its high rate of accuracy.

"If a lab test is 90 percent accurate, it is considered a good test," explained Fung. The new test for Candida surpasses this mark at a rare 99.5 percent accuracy.

The yeast test is also notable for other qualities. "This medium is simple to make," Fung said.

Test results are available quickly, he said, often in 12 to 24 hours. The combination of simplicity, accuracy and rapid results make the test an attractive one for medical microbiologists who must detect millions of yeast infections each year.

6 candidates run for board position

Incumbents, challengers face problems of class overcrowding, school funding

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Six candidates have met the Jan. 2 filing deadline to run for the U.S.D. 383 School Board elections.

Three of the four incumbents whose terms expire in June will seek re-election, and three new challengers will campaign for a position on the board during the April election.

All the candidates said the problems of school overcrowding and funding, which continue to plague the district, are the most significant issues of this election.

Incumbent Mary Nichols, who has been active in working for the school board's needs with legislators, stressed the importance of fairness in funding through the state's school-finance formula. The formula considers relative community wealth and property tax evaluation.

"School finance is a significant issue in the future of education of our children," Nichols said. "It is imperative that the legislators in Topeka are able to achieve true fairness in the school-finance formula. Passage of the special school-finance interim committee recommendations would result in property tax relief in this district plus and increased budget per pupil."

Nichols is the mother of three children and has taught storytelling at K-State for 12 years. She was a 1987 Future Manhattan class member and has served on two local elementary school's and Manhattan Middle School's improvement teams. She is the president of the school board and will be completing her first term.

Jim Lindquist, who has served a term on the board, said he considers the most urgent issues to be temporary relief of overcrowding and the funding provided by the school-finance formula.

"For a decision to be made (about overcrowding) we need to consider the property tax issue and get relief of some kind by the Legislature," Lindquist said. "We must increase aid coming into Manhattan."

Lindquist said without the relief, the taxpayers will not be as willing to spend money on a permanent solution to the overcrowding problem.

Lindquist said the community's uneasiness over Fort Riley's future dampens hope of reaching a solution.

"Fort Riley causes doubts in people's minds," he said. "We need to show the public that it will stay."

Use of modern technology in district schools is a major concern of Lindquist's.

"We must increase use of technology in our schools," he said. "Children need to have knowledge of changing technology. We have to do the best job in preparing them for life after school."

Lindquist said he values his three-and-a-half years on the board as a tremendous and necessary learning experience.

Joleen Hill agrees more space must be provided. She said the mobile classrooms currently used to house students will eventually catch up to the district.

Hill said accountability of schools is a major concern of hers.

"There are no unskilled jobs anymore," she said. "Students must have the ability to reason and be lifelong learners. There is so much new information. Our Schools must be accountable."

Hill also said programs in early childhood education are important.

"We need to find students coming to school prepared," she said. "Education is not just 12 years long. It starts at birth and ends at death."

Maurice Azain, challenger for a board position, questions the cost of running the school district. He said it costs millions of dollars more than currently stated and recommends budget oversight committee for the district.

"Band-aid money is working. We don't need more money," he said.

Azain supports mobile classrooms as a solution to overcrowding because they can be built quickly. Though the mobile units would be an inexpensive solution, he said a $100,000 study must be done prior to approval.

"The system is working. Let's proceed slowly," Azain said. "Let's not stop progress."

Azain received his masters degree in public administration at K-State.

He graduated from military school and served two years in Vietnam.

Challenger Sue Boxer said she does not believe band-aid solutions will solve the overcrowding problem, but that the community needs to prepare for the future.

She said she is not a politician with all the answers. But, she knows there must be a change, and issues must be thoroughly researched for the best solution.

"We need to make changes, but nobody likes change. Not everyone's expectations may be met," she said. "We need a board that the public has confidence in. The board must feel empowered enough to make a decision and stand by it with sureness and finality."

Boxer said she wonders why school children are not asked what they want. She said through experience with her own children, she has learned to trust their opinions.

Boxer said she is biased toward a sixth-grade center. She said it would allow students to become better acclimated with a more diverse atmosphere, expand friendships and help them make the move into the middle school.

Boxer said she has an administrative background, and created the Children's Discovery Museum at the Manhattan Town Center.

Kathy Ellis, a first-time candidate, said she believes the district needs an affordable, alternative funding plan.

"There is not adequate funding for our district," she said. "We must have some way to make money in addition to property taxes."

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Little or no increase expected in apartment rent

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

K-State students can expect little or no increase in apartment-rental rates this year because the local rental market is soft, and there are plenty of units available.

Brenda Sewell, director of residential property management at the Curtin Companies, said they are projecting an average price increase on a two-bedroom, furnished apartment of between $10 and $15.

She said her guess is the average increase for student rentals would be reasonably similar.

Sewell said the deployment of the 1st Infantry Division would probably not affect the student market because there are few military personnel in student rentals.

There are two distinct apartment markets in Manhattan, the largest being the student market in the areas immediately surrounding K-State.

"That market, in my opinion, will not be affected, because we expect similar or greater demand for those apartment units this year compared to last year," Sewell said.

The second market is the non-student market typically situated on the west side of Manhattan.

"There will be greater availability in those properties this year," Sewell said. "However, it is important to remember that while deployment has some effect, the majority of military individuals living in Manhattan have kept their apartments so as to have a home available when they are redeployed back to this area."

Sewell said to keep this in perspective — with 20,000 students and 2,000 military in Manhattan (counting those who rent and own homes) — clearly change in the student numbers affect rental availability to a greater degree.

Jim Blanton, owner of Blanton Realty, said there is an adequate supply of apartments and homes. Supply now actually exceeds the demand, and there isn't a lot of demand now for homes or apartments.

Blanton said the deployment of the 1st Infantry Division has hurt the market some. Many of the soldiers who left for Saudi Arabia also left families behind. Some of those families left to live with relatives and parents.

Some single people had to give up their units when they left for Saudi Arabia, he said.

Blanton predicted there would be no drastic price decreases yet. The prices would be very steady and possibly decline by about 3 percent.

January has always been one of the poorest rental months of the year, said Ralph Wasem, property manager at Coldwell Banker Schoenrock Realtors.

Wasem said economic conditions vary among landlords, and the rate of inflation has depreciated the dollars that they are now receiving.

"I don't see a general increase,"

Wasem said. "However, if property taxes or insurance goes up, then they (property owners) may need to pass their costs on to the tenants."

There are many variables to consider in the rental price of a home or apartment, Wasem said. The larger the apartment or home, the costlier they can be. Tenants can also expect to pay more to live in recently built apartment complexes or homes.

The landowners may choose to renovate the building and pass the cost of renovations on to the tenants, he said.

For example, Wasem said rental prices in the Phelps Section, north of Clafin and west of College Avenue, will vary from $375-$550 a home. However, most of the owners in this section do not rent to college students.

"This depends on what renovations the owners have done to them," said Wasem.

Although there may be a lot of rental property available and not enough tenants, this is only temporary, said Bill Fogerson, president of Realty Group One.

Fogerson said his company primarily sells homes, but also operates a referral service. Property owners can call in to list their rental property.

Fogerson said he anticipates the 1st Infantry Division will be back in June, since they are currently on temporary duty. It is also hard to get out of leases unless the owner is willing.

Station recording messages to gulf

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan Town Center sidewalk sale attracted large crowds and long lines, but people didn't mind waiting for one thing — to videotape a message for soldiers stationed in the gulf.

Station K6KZ of Junction City taped 25 families within the first 25 minutes of being at the mall from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. Saturday, said Robert Raff, head of the camera crew. The station has given over 400 family members and friends of deployed military a chance to send greetings to troops during the last two weeks.

Raff said the crew taped 240 families in Junction City last week and they are scheduled to be at different businesses in Manhattan, Junction City and Riley for the next eight weeks.

"We just want to help support the Big Red One and the dependents that are still here," Raff said. "We're in television so we just figured this was a natural way to help send greetings over there that are a little more personal."

All the messages will be combined into one tape which will be distributed by the public affairs unit in Saudi Arabia, Raff said.

About 15 tapes will be distributed to the 11 units containing Big Red One members.

Carole Vjuren, whose husband is stationed in the Middle East, said she wanted to tape a message because the mail to and from the gulf has been slow.

"I sent something two days after my husband left on December 18th and he still hasn't gotten it

Area financially hurt

CHRISTINE SPLICHAL
Collegian Reporter

The Persian Gulf War and the deployment of Fort Riley's 1st Infantry Division is affecting this area in many ways, and the Division of Continuing Education at K-State has not escaped unscathed.

Ed McAleer, director of Continuing Education's Academic Outreach, said the deployment is creating a significant void.

The obvious effect of the deployment is financial, McAleer said. It is financially significant and has constituted a $30,000 drop for Continuing Education since the crisis began. That figure could grow to nearly $50,000 in the next several months.

The large financial drop can be partially credited to a Board of Regents' mandate concerning troop deployment. The mandate says any soldier enrolled in a class is allowed a full refund of tuition if deployed to the Middle East. McAleer said K-State honored that mandate and has refunded tuition to many of the soldiers.

For more than two decades, K-

State has offered credit bearing courses at Fort Riley. Normally, there are about 40 courses offered every five- to eight-week educational cycle. On an average, 40 to 50 percent of those enrolled in courses are non-military personnel.

"If I were looking for a word to describe the relationship between K-State and Fort Riley, it has been symbiotic in the truest sense of the word," McAleer said. "We've been good for the army and they have been good for us — financially and they've given us good numbers in the classes. We've given them the ability to get their education started."

McAleer said Academic Outreach is used to a certain out migration at the fort. "What is noteworthy is the numbers. It's been a real kick in the teeth," he said. There are now less than 3,000 troops left at the fort. Since the activation of the Division in November more than 12,000 people have left.

Certain steps were taken in anticipation of the huge out migration. Reductions in the number of courses offered and setting minimums for class

Pre-med students face exams

VALERIE HEARON
Collegian Reporter

Students enrolled in the pre-medicine curriculum at K-State face several challenges getting into medical school.

For example, a student must earn a bachelor's degree, while maintaining a grade point average of 3.5, as well as receive letters of recommendations from faculty and go through several interviews with administrators.

Students must also pass the Medical College Admission Test. Pre-med seniors will face the MCAT this April. The six-hour written exam covers biology, physical science, verbal reasoning and also includes an essay.

"The students receive their scores about six weeks after they have taken the exam," said Susan Gormely, health profession adviser.

"The average pre-med student is in school for a possible eight to 10 years — four years for an undergraduate degree, four years for medical school, and up to three years for residency," Gormely said.

Many students change their majors when the pre-med curriculum gets difficult.

"Being a freshman in pre-med isn't really different than being a freshman in any other major," said John Isermann, freshman in pre-med. "But looking upon upcoming years, the curriculum gets a lot harder a lot faster."

"Not everybody goes on to medical school — it differs from year to year," Isermann said. "It is difficult to get in. They recommend a 3.5 GPA before someone will actually look at you. And with all the tests and courses you have to take, you have to be dedicated to make it."

Many of the K-State students who gain entrance to medical school go to the University of Kansas.

Board looking at insurance options

Student Health Advisory Board begins search, considers variety of packages

S. KATHERINE DIETRICH
Science/Health Reporter

The Student Health Advisory Board began its annual search for a student health insurance program today with their first meeting of the spring semester.

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene Health Services, said each year the board considers a variety of insurance packages to offer non-insured students.

After meeting with insurance company representatives over the next few weeks, the board will make recommendations to the Student Governing Association. SGA will then finalize the insurance package choice for the 1991-1992 school year.

Members of the board said there is confusion about the availability of health insurance for students at K-State.

"There is a misconception that the student health fee is an insurance fee," Zweimiller said.

Consequently some students who are already insured mistakenly believe that they can waive their health fees.

"We explained to them that it wasn't a user's fee," said E.J. Schwartz, SHAB member. Schwartz answered questions about health services during fee payment last fall.

Zweimiller said the student health fee supports 75 percent of the operation of Lafene's health services. User fees, like charges for X-rays or certain treatments, make up the other 25 percent of the budget.

There is no chance to see a physician at Lafene. But if a student needs treatments beyond the scope of the campus health center, insurance can ease the burden.

According to the January 1991 issue of the Journal of American College Health, most college students age 19 to 24 have insurance. Young adult students can be covered by their parents' health plans if they stay in school or are under a certain age.

Dependents of military personnel also qualify for coverage under programs available to them outside the campus system.

Yet some students aren't able to take advantage of these options. About 1,500 students at K-State subscribe to the current campus health insurance plan.

Blue Cross/Blue Shield is the insurance supplier for K-State students this academic year. Blue Cross supplies more college health insurance plans than any other company in the United States, according to the JACH.

Under the current Blue Cross plan, single students pay a monthly premium of $52. A comparable plan off campus would cost $120.

The plan pays 50 percent of medical costs outside Lafene, up to a student contribution of $1,000. However, it covers all costs at Lafene including services like pelvic exams for which there is a charge.

Although some companies charge smaller premiums than Blue Cross, Zweimiller said that ultimately it will be the individual company's reputation and cost taken into account when insurance plans are considered.

Because Blue Cross is reputable and is a nationwide system, there are benefits to maintaining their plan next year, Zweimiller said. The transition into non-student health insurance after graduation is made easier when dealing with a company as large and accessible as Blue Cross.

Student receives music award, advances to nationals

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Jason Schafer, senior in applied music, was declared the 1990-91 West Central Division winner in the Collegiate classification of the Music Teachers National Association-CPP/ Belwin Student Composition Contest. Schafer's piece, "Hallucinations," a work for brass quintet was selected as the winner of the division made up of Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota and South Dakota.

After submitting his piece to the state competition, it was selected to represent Kansas in the West Central Division Competition.

Schafer described himself as feeling ecstatic and quite surprised the piece had been received so highly. Schafer's piece was selected over 10 entries at the state level and seven at the division level.

Michael Mauldin, national chairman of the competition, praised Schafer's piece and said the judges were highly complimentary.

After winning the divisional competition, his work was sent to compete nationally. "Hallucinations" placed in the top five.

Schafer began playing the piano at age nine and sang in the Manhattan High School choir. He began composing music in high school.

'Cats look to snap pair of streaks

Conference, home-court skids could be erased with 'W'

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

If ever there was a time for the Wildcats to right themselves, it surely is now.

With an 0-4 start in the Big Eight, their second-worst conference start in school history, the 'Cats are desperate for a win against a Big Eight opponent.

For tonight's 6:35 contest in Bramlage Coliseum, there is much more at stake than just a win against a Big Eight opponent. The 'Hawks of KU bring a 13-4 record to Manhattan, and the timing couldn't be better for the 'Cats to come out of their shell.

The team limped home after losing three consecutive conference road games, seeking home court refuge in a conference in which only Nebraska has scored a victory on the road.

"It's good to be back at home," Coach Dana Altman said. "We've struggled a little lately and have had a tough road stretch, so it's just good to be playing here."

Kansas, which moved into the AP poll at No. 24 Monday, has destroyed opponents — N.C. State, Missouri and Colorado included — on their home floor. They have found winning more difficult on the road, losing at Oklahoma and Oklahoma State.

In a conference where the home court advantage appears to be everything, however, one must be reminded of KU's sacking of Bramlage last season. Ranked No. 2 in the country, the Jayhawks humiliated the Wildcats 85-57, recording the biggest margin of victory for a KU team in Manhattan.

The 'Cats clanged away at the familiar rims for only 36.5 percent from the field while KU scorched the nets with 60 percent shooting.

The Wildcats have lost seven in a row to KU in Manhattan. To put that in perspective, the last time the 'Cats beat their intrastate rivals at home, Danny Manning was still a high school twinkle in Larry Brown's eye and Les Craft was the star of Ahearn Field House.

"We've had a lot of close games in the past few years. The teams have been very evenly matched," Altman said. "But they aren't intimidated about coming in here, and they never let up on the road."

Altman was quick to point out that the huge margin in shooting percentages at Manhattan last season was not a fluke. The Jayhawks possess the top shooting percentage, .550, of any team in the nation, while the Wildcats rank last in the conference, shooting .458.

"They've shot the ball very well all season," Altman said. "We'll just have to get up on them and not let them shoot it over us uncontested."

Striking fear in the hearts of those who witnessed last year's Bramlage blowout is Jayhawk off-guard Terry Brown, who connected on eight-of-12 attempts and led all scorers with 21 points. Brown shot 50 percent from 3-point land in the two games against K-State last year, and with 70 3-pointers this season is on pace to shatter Steve Henson's Big Eight season record of 93 treys.

Brown leads the balanced Jayhawk team in scoring with 19.5 points per game, followed by Mark Randall with 14.2, Adonis Jordan with 11.8, and Alonzo Jamison with 10.8.

Though the front line of K-State, with 6-10 John Rettiger and 6-9 Maurice Brittain starting, matches up

Overly gracious hosts

In the last seven games played between K-State and KU in Manhattan, the Jayhawks are undefeated. They won in their final five games in Ahearn Field House, and have taken the first two meetings in Bramlage Coliseum.

favorably with the smaller Jayhawks, the play of his big men has Altman worried of late.

Concerned by his team's play in the paint entering last weekend's game with Oklahoma State, Altman watched his post-player rotation produce 14 fouls and just 12 points.

Altman criticized the front line for not moving well in the paint on defense against the Cowboys, picking up fouls by relying on bodying-up techniques.

Stopping Randall, Jamison, and Mike Maddox, the big men of KU who effectively execute cuts away from the ball, will require more active, alert defense.

BIG!
BIG!
BIG!

Oliver Kaubisch/Staff
Mitch Holthus (middle), voice of the Wildcats, calls the action on the Wildcat Radio Network at the UMKC game Jan. 15 in Municipal Auditorium in Kansas City, Mo. Tonight, K-State will host the Jayhawks, and Holthus will be heard on 41 stations.

Holthus enjoys work on radio network

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

The year was 1987. K-State had just captured one of the biggest road games in the history of its men's basketball program for first-year coach Lon Kruger — a 90-89 victory over Oklahoma.

When the final buzzer sounded, something simple and different was heard from Mitch Holthus, the voice of the Wildcats. It had something to do with the significance of the win.

Holthus repeated the single word "big" six times.

The moment was to provide Holthus with the patented "big" signature for the rest of his broadcasting career.

Since that historic day, Holthus and his "bigs" have been launched toward radio stardom and have built a strong history for themselves.

Since that time, the word has been used up to as many as 10 times in a game, but never more. Yup, you guessed it, the 72-61 win over arch-rival Kansas in the 1987-88 season to break a 55-game home winning streak brought forth the double-digit number.

"It was the first time I had broadcast where K-State beat Kansas," Holthus said. "I could still show you the sheet I wrote them on."

However, every game does not measure up to the standards of the "big" system, and Holthus said it is usually only used five or six times in a year, including both football and basketball.

This year the total may escalate in numbers because of the success the football team experienced. Holthus has all ready categorized the New Mexico State, Oklahoma State and Iowa State football wins as "big" as well as the Wyoming, Wichita State and the BMA Classic championship basketball victories.

Tonight, as K-State hosts Kansas in hopes of its first conference victory on the season, there are eight "bigs" waiting on the backburner.

"There will be eight tomorrow night. Ever since I have been the voice, we haven't beaten them at home," Holthus said. "That has been seven straight years, tomorrow will be eight."

Just as for the rest of the state of Kansas, Holthus is caught up in the emotion surrounding the K-State-Kansas games. He is a 1979 journalism and business graduate of K-State and hails from Smith Center.

"This game is special to me because K-State is my alma mater. It is a blessing to do the play-by-play for your alma mater," Holthus said.

This is where problems sometimes arise. Holthus cannot let his excitement and love for K-State get in the way of his career and journalistic approach.

"I try to research something that everyone doesn't know about Kansas. I try to do the game so a KU fan could listen to the game and not think I was a cheerleader," Holthus said. "Some of the best compliments I have ever received are from people that are KU fans."

Holthus has the longest stay on the Wildcat radio network since the legendary Dev Nelson, who was the voice from 1954-79, and has been named Kansas Sportscaster of the Year in 1987 and 1989 for his work.

Holthus admitted that filling the shoes of Nelson was simply impossible. "He was the Yoda for me and a lot of other people. He was a mentor. The shoes were too big," Holthus said. "I just wanted to keep the tradition going. I feel the same way (Coach Dana) Altman does coming after (Jack) Hartman and (Lon) Kruger."

Holthus began as the voice of the Wildcats in the 1984-85

season after doing the color commentary in the 1983-84 season. For the past eight years, K-State has been building a stronger tradition that is being etched in the mind of Holthus.

"My most memorable game was in Pontiac, Mich., when K-State played Kansas to see who would go to the Final Four. You just know something huge was going to happen and you would be there to be a part of it," Holthus said. "And the North Texas win. I received more personal notoriety for the call on the last-second play to beat North Texas and end the long losing streak than any other call."

When talking to Holthus, it is easy to see his love for K-State is deeply rooted. He has been approached by numerous colleges, but has never accepted an interview. He said the closest he came was in Dec. 1989, when he had an inquiry from WGN in Chicago to do the

'The Game' upon us

A rivalry that originated in 1907 is about to be renewed.

The men's basketball teams from K-State and the University of Kansas have met each other 219 times on the hardwoods since the Jayhawks claimed a 54-39 win in Lawrence in the series opener.

And here's betting the 220th renewal of the Sunflower State Series will be a dandy.

The records, however, would seem to indicate otherwise.

Kansas is 13-4 overall and 2-2 in the Big Eight. The Jayhawks moved into the Top 25 Monday at No. 24.

K-State is 10-7 overall and 0-4 in the conference, and the Wildcats allowed Nebraska to enter Bramlage Coliseum and leave with one of only two road wins any Big Eight team has achieved this season.

To top off all this statistical mumbo-jumbo, KU has downed K-State seven straight times in Manhattan. Seven straight. I was a freshman — back in my glorious undergraduate days — when Les Craft and Co. downed KU in 1983 in Ahearn Field House.

But toss the stats out the window. Not that they lie, but emotion tends to play a pretty big part in how these games usually turn out.

And if Bramlage isn't absolutely electric tonight, then something is desperately wrong in these parts.

First of all, this is the K-State-KU game. It's the Hatfields and the McCoy's, dogs and cats, the Hulkster and the Macho Man, Silo Tech and Snob Hill.

Secondly, this one's on national television. Those fine folks from the Entertainment and Sports Programming Network — that's ESPN to you and me — will be beaming the contest to cable homes across the land.

And, if my memory serves me correctly, there are a few hams in these parts more than willing to cut up before anything with a lens. If it comes to national television, there's no telling what some people in these parts might do.

Coach uses phone, connections to recruit foreign tennis players

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

To follow the K-State tennis team, one doesn't need a scorecard, but an atlas.

Coach Steve Bietau may not be a master of languages or geography, but he certainly seems adept at assembling talent from the farthest reaches of the globe.

The tennis team has, at times, been a small melting pot of personalities and playing styles from around the world. The infusion of foreign players has been instrumental in the continued development of the team.

Last season, the top three players on the team were Marijke Nel from South Africa, Helen Schildknecht from Switzerland, and Sara Hancock from England, each of whom finished her eligibility last season.

During their junior and senior seasons, the three helped the team to records of 14-6 and 14-9. Before the three came to K-State, the team had recorded just one winning season in its history. Bietau said the presence of foreign players on an improved team is not coincidental.

"If you look at college tennis, the best teams have a number of international players," Bietau said. "Tennis is played in more countries around the world than soccer, so it is by nature a very international sport."

Recruiting outside the United States has become essential to a winning program, Bietau said. Most of the elite American players opt to play at schools on the coasts or in metropolitan areas, so searching foreign soil becomes necessary for finding players of equal caliber.

"The very good American players, when asked where they want to play, for whatever reason, don't tell you a Midwest school," Bietau said. "As a team moves up the ladder as we have, the pool of players you can choose from becomes smaller."

"The top teams go anywhere to find the top players, and the competition for players gets tougher at higher levels. So including foreign players makes the talent pool bigger and allows schools like K-State to be more competitive."

Two foreign players have joined the squad to help continue the progress spearheaded by last year's seniors. Schildknecht tipped Bietau off to a fellow native of Switzerland, freshman Michele Riniker, who played in the No. 1 spot in the fall season. Bietau added freshman Rosemary Hunter of Australia to the team this semester.

Unfortunate circumstances have come with foreign recruitment, Bietau said, but he emphasized those hazards

Buckeyes get first-place votes

By the Associated Press

UNLV continues unbeaten, but the Runnin' Rebels' dominance is no longer unquestioned.

For the first time in four weeks, UNLV (15-0) failed to get all 64 first-place votes in weekly poll of sports writers and broadcasters.

In the poll released Monday, two voters picked Ohio State as No. 1. The Buckeyes moved from fourth to third after beating Indiana and Minnesota last week.

Ohio State (17-0) was one of four teams in last week's Top 10 which did not lose. The others were UNLV, a winner over UC-Santa Barbara and Louisville; Arkansas, which beat Texas A&M and Baylor and remained No. 2; and St. John's, which jumped from No. 10 to fifth with victories over Connecticut and Villanova.

UNLV, the defending national champion, is on a 26-game winning streak and has been No. 1 for 11 straight weeks. In the latest poll, the Runnin' Rebels got 1,598 points, 82 points more than Arkansas and 108 more than Ohio State.

Completing the Top 10 are No. 4 Indiana, St. John's, Arizona, Duke, Syracuse, North Carolina and Kentucky. Arizona dropped to sixth from fifth; Duke moved from ninth to seventh; Syracuse dropped from sixth to eighth; North Carolina dropped from No. 7 to No. 9 and Kentucky dipped from eighth to 10th.

Nebraska (17-2) advanced three spots to No. 11.

Completing the Top 25 are UCLA, Utah, Louisiana State, Virginia, East Tennessee State, Southern Mississippi, Georgetown, Pittsburgh, New Mexico State, Oklahoma, New Orleans, Georgia Tech, Kansas and Seton Hall.

Kansas is in the poll for the first time this season after being No. 1 for four weeks last season and never falling out of the Top Five. The Jayhawks beat Wichita State and Colorado last week.

Finally, for true Wildcat fans, this game provides the first real chance of the season to turn up the Brame volume meter.

This is the first Big Eight home game in which the students — God bless the rowdy lot — will be in attendance and in full vocal splendor. I cherish the thought of barely being able to hear myself think on press row.

But emotion needn't lie only with the fans.

It can also pulse within the players and coaches.

KU, as previously noted, is now ranked. The Jayhawk players will be scrapping to protect that national spotlight and will be attempting to send Mark Randall out with four wins in Manhattan in his four years in Jayhawk crimson and blue.

K-State, as also previously mentioned, has lost four straight in the conference, not to mention the home drought against KU.

If that isn't motivation enough, try the prospect of slipping further into the league cellar on for size. K-State hasn't exactly been in the penthouse in the past few years, but the out-house sure has an ugly view.

Roll all this together and you get a nice, neat emotional equivalent of a Patriot missile.

For just a moment, those inside Bramlage will be treated to an explosion that they'll likely want to remember long after these trying times in our world are done.

aren't sufficiently greater than in recruiting within the states.

One problem for Bietau comes from the difference in schedules for schools in other countries. Like Hunter, many foreign players must wait until semester break to join the team, depriving them of the fall training season.

Communication during recruitment can be difficult as well. A player from South Africa that Bietau was counting heavily upon for this spring suddenly backed out. During recruiting, Bietau was unsure of the condition of an injured knee that Hunter is slowly rehabilitating. Such problems, however, arise just as easily in stateside recruiting, Bietau said.

"It's not without some risk," Bietau said. "But to say that foreign players bring increased problems is not accurate. We only recruit the best players who qualify academically and who are the kind of people that will represent the program well."

Financially, recruiting players from foreign countries, has been more cost efficient than recruiting within the states. A large number of foreign players play at community colleges in the United States before moving to four-year schools. Others are attracted by friends or other contacts to attend a particular school.

Coaching in his seventh season at K-State, Bietau took his first recruiting trip outside of the country last fall when he flew to Australia to visit Hunter.

"Of course I'd like to be traveling all over the world to recruit, but of course that just isn't possible," Bietau said. "Financially, it actually costs less to recruit foreign players because most of it is done through contacts and references from players already here. It makes for one heck of a phone bill, but it's cheaper than traveling within the United States to look at players."

Rinkier is a prime example of one player's reference attracting another to a particular school. Schildknecht transferred to K-State after two All-American seasons at Midland (Tex.) Junior College.

Schildknecht told Bietau about Rinkier, a close friend, who was one of the top-ranked amateurs in Switzerland. Bietau said Schildknecht was the primary reason for Rinkier's decision to attend K-State.

Bietau said having foreign players on the squad keeps things interesting and allows all the players, American and foreign, to gain a different perspective of life.

"They're always a lot of fun and have a little different background, so we get some interesting discussions going in the van sometimes," Bietau said. "Language barriers don't get in the way much on the court. It can make their schoolwork a little tougher, but these girls are always very intelligent and very dedicated. They always do very well."

Foreign players are not favored over Americans in any way.

"Anyone who thinks that we would take a player from another country over one of equal ability from here in Kansas is mistaken," Bietau said. "Obviously, we would like to have six players from Kansas on the squad."

"I will never take a player of equal ability from out of state over one from Kansas, but as long as there's an emphasis on being competitive, you have to recognize the fact that the talent pool is bigger around the world, and to compete you have to keep moving up on the scale of talent."

Cubs or Bears games.

"If I could spend the rest of my life at K-State, it would be awesome," Holthus said. "I have some big decisions to make in the next couple of years, but I am postponing those feelings because I am more excited about things at K-State ever since I have been here."

"I want to be in the booth when we get a bowl bid. And when we go to the Final Eight again, or the Final Four, I want to be sitting there."

Fewer species cause of man

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Imagine a plane flying, held together with 20,000 bolts. Then imagine each bolt falling out one by one. Each single bolt is important. As each one falls out, the plane becomes unstable.

This is how James Carpenter, associate professor of exotic animal and wildlife medicine, explained the impact of the loss of an endangered species at a presentation to the Friends of the Sunset Zoo Thursday at the Manhattan Holiday.

Once there were 100 to 500 million species on the Earth. Today there are five to 10 million, Carpenter said. Extinction is natural, but not when it is the result of the activities of man.

Carpenter's speech, "The Recovery of the Whooping Crane: A 'Success' Story for Endangered Species," was the first in a series of three presentations to be given in the 1991 Friends of the Sunset Zoo Winter Education Program Series, said Ron Schulze, curator of education at the Sunset Zoo.

Whooping cranes have never been a populous species, numbering only about 2,000 at their most abundant. In 1941, the species hit a low of 21 birds.

The current population of 213 birds is the result of the work done by Carpenter and his colleagues at the Patuxent Wildlife Research Center of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service in Laurel, Md. Before coming to K-State, Carpenter worked at Patuxent from 1974 until 1989.

Carpenter said the success of the work done with the whooping crane is due to many things.

"There is no one technique that protects wildlife," he said. "Among the factors that contribute are law enforcement, public education, habitat protection and research."

Carpenter's research has been in the field of propagation, the art of captive breeding. That is only one small part of research, and each one complements the other. Problems contributing to the decline of the whooping crane include the conversion of prairie potholes to agriculture, collectors and the low reproductive potential of the species.

The $10 million research project at Patuxent experienced many setbacks, including the reluctance of the cranes to breed in captivity. Therefore, a method of artificially inseminating the birds was developed, he said.

The first egg was produced in 1975 and then hatched in a laboratory. However, the bird soon developed problems. It suffered from diarrhea, lost interest in eating and then developed an outward rotation of its legs. The chick died after 16 days.

Eventually, the program began to use surrogate parents in the form of sand hill cranes. This allowed the rearing of up to 60 chicks at one time. Some sand hill cranes were colored to look like whooping cranes to prevent imprinting problems with the chicks.

Carpenter went to the Soviet Union in 1980 and 1988 to work with biologists studying cranes. He said the conditions there were significantly different than in the United States. Carpenter spent time at both the Moscow Zoo and in a biological commune.

He instructed the Soviet scientists in various veterinary procedures and surgically sexing the birds. Carpenter said that while working with other countries, he found that saving endangered species is a luxury.

"We can't expect a country with starving people to spend $10 million on it," he said.

Carpenter said the future of the whooping crane looks good, but with only one major population a disaster could occur at any time. The cranes are very susceptible to changes in the environment of their migration area, which ranges from Canada to Texas. They migrate across Kansas, stopping at Cheyenne Bottoms Wildlife Refuge near Great Bend.

Volunteers counsel battered victims

Crisis Center offers training sessions, temporary housing, 24-hour hotline

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

Every 18 seconds an act of domestic violence occurs in the United States. In those incidents, 97 percent of the assaulters are male, and 94 percent of the victims are female.

Kim Blubaugh, director of Manhattan Crisis Center, gave those facts at the first training session for 40 new crisis center volunteers Saturday in the Harris Activity Center. Volunteers enable the crisis center to help local victims of domestic violence.

According to the book "Battered Women" by Lenore Walker, battering is the major cause of injury to women. American women are more likely to seek emergency surgery for injuries caused by battering than by car accidents, muggings and rapes combined.

Domestic violence occurs in all countries and pervades all social classes, Blubaugh said.

In Kansas, about 286,000 people experience routine violence in the home, and 50 percent live in a family where violence has occurred at least one time, according to a crisis center report.

Since 1978, the crisis center has offered help. A 24-hour crisis line serves Clay, Geary, Pottawatomie, Riley and Marshall counties, Volunteer Coordinator Caroline Silva said.

Temporary housing for emergency cases has been available since 1981, Blubaugh said. It temporarily housed 297 women last year.

With an annual budget of $235,000 and only 10 staff members, round-the-clock service could not be offered without the crisis center's volunteers. Between 30 and 50 active volunteers work 13,000 working hours every year, Blubaugh said. Another 1,000 to 1,200 help in support groups.

"For the most part, students and community members help us out," Silva said. "Many students stay for only one semester, some for one year. Three have already got a three-year working experience."

Volunteers also work with the women who are in a violent relationship with the goal of making women feel better, understand their relationship and know what help is available, Silva said.

"We train people to understand domestic violence and be sensitive to the issue of it," Silva said.

Edward Elder, recent K-State graduate, said working as a volunteer strengthens his convictions.

U.S. battered women statistics

"It's an extension of activity, things I've already been doing, my belief in human orders," he said.

The next training sessions are scheduled for Wednesday, Feb. 6, and Saturday, Feb. 9. Interested volunteers call 539-2785 for more information.

Manhattan residents exhibit quilting work

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

If you don't know what Kansas Dugout and Kansas Duststorm are, ask a quilter. Both are quilt blocks that commemorate Kansas' rich history. Riley County Senior Service Center wants to revive that history for its Third Annual Kansas Day Quilt Show.

Donna McCallum, program coordinator, expects around 50 quilts to be on display at 1 p.m. Jan. 26 at the Senior Center in Manhattan. "We've had quilts over 150 years old at past shows, but most are new," McCallum said. "Each quilt has a different story, so at the event each person is given a chance to get up and tell about their quilts."

A majority of the quilts on display will be those sewn by Anne Bundy, Manhattan resident. Bundy spent six years putting together over 200 quilts and wallhangings before becoming blind in 1984 due to diabetes.

Bundy started quilting when her husband had heart surgery and she needed something to occupy her time.

"My daughter and I went to a festival in Baldwin and we saw a sampler quilt. She asked me to make her one, and I didn't know how. So, she bought me a book and I learned," Bundy said.

"I made about 70 different blocks, and by the time I got them done, she had changed her mind on which pattern she wanted. You know, I never did make that quilt."

Her first quilt was "patch basket," made for her daughter. Most of the rest have been given to her other four children and family members. She said even those she has kept have been earmarked for specific people.

She's never quilted the tops herself, just pieced them. Bundy said she's never designed her own blocks either.

"I'm a copier. I've never had enough courage to do my own designs. I add a border or something, but mostly I copy," Bundy said. "I like applique so my quilts are big, splashy ones. Originally I did a lot of Earth tones, the oranges, yellows and browns, but then I switched to primary colors."

Bundy's quilts and many others can be seen at the Senior Center on Kansas Day. The center has no organized quilting group, but they are coordinating the event with the help of the Konza Prairie Quilter's Guild.

Family Center trains, serves

Counseling offered to aid spouses of soldiers in gulf

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

K-State's Family Center is helping the students, the community and the state.

"The purpose of the center is three-fold — training, service and research," said Mark White, coordinator of Marriage and Family Therapy Services and assistant director of the center.

The center, which was established in 1972, is located in Ellen Richards Lodge on Campus Creek Road.

The Family Center, sponsored by the College of Human Ecology, provides a laboratory for students' educational training. Students working on master and doctoral degrees in the college work as therapists at the center.

"Students get a variety of training," White said. "It's good experience for them."

The center consists of two parts — the marriage and family therapy clinic and family life education and consultation clinic, said Director Steve Bollman.

"We provide individual, couple and family counseling," White said. "Presently we are forming a group for the spouses of military men and women who will have their significant other in the gulf."

"We provide quality services," White said. "We don't place students (as therapists) without at least one year of experience."

Faculty and graduate students at the center also speak to organizations and conduct workshops on various topics including aging, family, children and divorce.

Services at the center are available to everyone — not just K-State students. Clients are often referred to the center by friends, pastors or teachers.

Scholarships are available to help clients pay for services. The charge per session is $60 and the scholarship amount is negotiated on the client's ability to pay.

"Because we're a land-grant university, research is also important," White said.

The center receives grants for research. Students and faculty at the center also work with the Social and Rehabilitation Services and occasionally with the education system.

The annual "Working With Families Conference" is also organized by the center. "Children Youth and their Families" is the theme of the 1991 conference planned for late September.

Video

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6 yet. The last time I heard from him was a phone call two weeks ago," Vjuren said. "I'm not even getting mail and that's why I was on the tape. I was pleading with him to send something. I don't know if he is just busy or it's not getting through."

Vjuren said packages over 11 oz. can no longer be sent.

"Troops are moving around so much it's hard for them to get them and they don't need extra things to carry."

The tapes will take less time than domestic mail, Raff said. "Our original estimate is ten days but we're telling people two weeks because you never know with the backup of mail and troops moving around," he said. "We've talked to a couple of soldiers over the phone and they're saying the mail is taking about ten days to two weeks."

Raff said he was told that every unit was equipped with a VCR and television when they left and troops should have access to them to view the tape.

Many of the people came to the taping dressed for the occasion. Several "Somebody in Saudi Arabia loves me" sweatshirts could be seen, as well as a wide array of clothing with painted on personalized messages. Others wore yellow ribbons or carried American flags.

During the event eleven men paraded through the mall following a peace march to K-State campus. They carried flags and wore leather jackets saying "Veteran Nomads, Inc."

"Unlike what happened in Vietnam, we don't want the soldiers to wait 20 years to find out we're behind them," said Rodney Barrick, a member of the group.

Support was an underlying theme in all the messages to soldiers.

Diane Jackson and her son sent Spc. Larry Jackson a simple message which was common in all the greetings videotaped — "We miss you. We love you. Please come home soon."

Grief

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 who are grieving is that they want to tell their story but no one wants to listen. People really need someone to talk to," he said.

The worst thing for a person to do is try to stop them from hurting, Balk said. Those close to the griever must realize that the hurt won't just stop and that it will take a long time for it to go away.

"Grieving is a long, long process. Death is not something we can get over quickly," he said.

Laves said it is also important to keep a daily routine, to keep life moving as regularly as possible.

"Keep yourself going. Make the effort to get into bed six or seven hours a night even if you don't sleep. Take the time to eat three meals a day. You may not feel hungry but it is important to go through the motions," he said. "When we're in a crisis the first thing we do is stop our routine. That should be the one thing we keep going."

Above all, Laves said, is to let out the emotions that are being experienced.

"We're a society that keeps things private," he said. "We're in the age of 'Thirty-something' and Yuppies. We have to keep it all together. We're all perfect. That ideal is just not realistic. We're not that way and we have to be able to express how we're feeling."

AWOL

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 What type of charges may be filed against her is unclear. Meseke said because Huet-Vaughn is assigned to the 325th Medical Company from Missouri, but had been attached for service with the 410th.

It will be up to which unit commander it is decided has authority over her to file charges against Huet-Vaughn, he said. The charges will determine what type of punishment she may receive if convicted.

Huet-Vaughn said she faces the possible loss of her license to practice if convicted in a military trial.

Classes

Ruth Stanley, assistant specialist for academic outreach at Fort Riley, said one-third of the classes were dropped in anticipation of lower enrollments. Although currently, enrollment is about what was expected.

Dependent military personnel are having a less obvious impact on Continuing Education. Many spouses and dependents will not be able to attend classes any longer. Reasons include some dependents have returned to home to stay with their families, others can no longer attend due to finances and some cannot attend without the support of their military spouse taking care of the children.

Stanley said the majority of the dependents did stay, but morale is a real problem. Some spouses are taking courses to keep busy and keep their minds off the war.

McCain

A residence hall theme dinner is also planned for Feb. 12 and is open to all residence hall members. The theme will be based on the production "Into The Woods," which will be showing in McCain on Feb. 16.

A special dinner will also be given on Feb. 16 for those students who have tickets to the production.

Johnson said he feels being a member of the council has many advantages. Many times the council has a reception following the productions and this allows the members to meet the entertainers.

Applications for the council will be available Feb. 25 and can be picked up in 120 Waters Hall. Knowledge of McCain events and campus involvement will be two influencing factors for choosing new members. The due date for applications is March 8.

Contest

On the tables in a small room in Weber Hall were 24 feed ingredients. Some were easily recognized by sight, others took a sniff, and one team even resorted to a small taste to identify the substance in the tin.

The dairy products and the meats stations focused on the end product of animal agriculture industry. Retail cuts of meat, like those found in grocery stores, were to be correctly identified at the meats station, as well as identifying wholesale cuts of meat on carcasses and skeletons.

The contestants were also required to identify muscle tissues under a microscope.

Identifying different varieties of cheeses made up a section of the dairy products stop. At the same station, contestants identified, by taste, defects in milk giving specific reasons why the milk was bad.

Participants said there are many reasons the quadrathlon is a popular contest. For some, it is to have fun and to gain an hour of credit, said Evan Backhus, senior in animal sciences and industry.

For others, it is a mission to win. Jon Bruning, senior in animal sciences and industry and third year contestant, enjoys the competition.

"It weeds out who does and doesn't know the information," Bruning said. "We're out to win. After all, third time's a charm."

The quadrathlon is now half over. The remaining two events, the quiz bowl and oral presentations, will be completed Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Results will be available later this week.

'Lovegod' mixes love, humor in debut album

STACEY HARBISON
Collegian Reviewer

"Lovegod," the title of the debut album from the hot new band The Soup Dragons, lives up to its name. Upon listening to the band's debut album, I was struck by the band's mixture of love, humor and social criticism.

The first attention-catcher is the well-crafted hummable pop tunes that weave their way into the memory to later reveal bizarre lyrical content.

The Soup Dragons attempt to create a broad musical palette through the use of wit and irony, but fail with endless repetition.

The album begins with "I'm Free." The catchy melody of this song makes up for the fact it has only one verse repeated over and over. The Persian Gulf War contributes to the success of the song currently heard on local air waves.

The album shifts gears in "Mother Universe." This song is the first of several to deal with love, God, heaven and hell. The lyrics ironically deal with the belief in God to get one to submit to another's will.

A single inspiration to slow dance appears in "Softly." At least the melody would inspire slow dancing, but a careful listen reveals lyrics about death.

The title song "Lovegod" more than makes up for the lack of lyrics. This song, like many others on the album, repeats the same verse.

"Dream-E-Forever" features more talk of pain and love that blends with the somewhat slower tune.

Not to say "Lovegod" is trash; on the contrary, I thoroughly enjoyed it. If the catchy tunes do not first entrap you, however, then you probably will never again listen to The Soup Dragons.

Charges filed

Man suspected in up to 7 fatal shootings

By the Associated Press

ESPANOLA, N.M. — Charges of first-degree murder and attempted murder were filed Monday against a 29-year-old man suspected in the fatal shootings of two lawmen and possibly five other people, including his girlfriend.

The officers were killed Saturday after they arrived at the man's home to serve a restraining order on him at his girlfriend's request, police said. The man, Ricky Abeyta, surrendered to New Mexico State Police in Albuquerque Sunday night.

Later, his two sisters were arrested in the case. Police would not elaborate on their involvement.

Abeyta, shackled around his waist and ankles, was arraigned Monday in Magistrate Court. His sisters were each charged with one count: Dora Abeyta, 35, was charged with the attempted murder of his girlfriend's son, 13-year-old Eloy Sandoval. Sandra Abeyta, 19, was charged with aggravated battery with a deadly weapon on another victim.

Innocent pleas were entered for all three. Abeyta was ordered held without bail and bond for each of his sisters was set at $50,000.

Officers reflect Baltic division

By the Associated Press

RIGA, U.S.S.R. — Hundreds of pro-Kremlin Latvian policemen jeered the republic's president Monday, reflecting the deep division in local law enforcement ranks over the issue of independence.

In the Lithuanian capital of Vilnius, about 1,000 of the republic's TV workers rallied to demand their jobs back. The workers have been locked out of work because of the Jan. 13 Soviet military takeover of the republic's TV facilities that killed 14 people.

The 500-800 Latvian police officers jammed an auditorium at the University of Latvia for a four-hour meeting with the Baltic republic's leaders, including their boss, Latvian Interior Minister Alois Vaznis, as well as President Anatolijs Gorbunovs and Prime Minister Ivars Godmanis.

The police whistled and hooted when Vaznis said he had tried to depoliticize the police force, which is part of the Interior Ministry, and they called for his resignation.

Soviets to pull troops from Baltics

Move may lessen tensions caused by military crackdown in Latvia, Lithuania

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union, in a dramatic move to improve relations with the United States, has promised to remove airborne and other troops from the Baltic republics and to reopen talks with independence-minded leaders there, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

The move to lessen tensions in the Baltics was described to President Bush in a message from Moscow carried by Soviet Foreign Minister Alexander A. Bessmertnykh, the officials said. They insisted upon anonymity.

The message did not include a promise to remove all outside military from Latvia and Lithuania, where 21 people were killed this month in clashes, and yet some units have been detected moving back from the Baltic republics, the officials told the Associated Press.

On the other hand, some of the Interior Ministry's "Black Berets," which played a key role against the independence drive, are from the area and apparently will remain there, the officials said.

Bush and Baker have been sharply critical of the harsh tactics used against the independence movement. But there was an odd silence on the subject Monday when Baker and Bessmertnykh announced the postponement of the Feb. 11-13 Bush-Gorbachev summit in Moscow.

Their joint announcement said simply that it would be "inappropriate" for Bush to go to Moscow in the midst of the Persian Gulf War. The other reason cited in a joint statement was that a treaty to slash U.S. and Soviet long-range nuclear weapons would not be ready for signature at the summit.

The pledge from Moscow clearly raised hopes within the administration that Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev was trying to defuse tensions in the area as well as reverse the slide in U.S.-Soviet relations.

War intentions remain stable

Bush delivers first State of the Union address at wartime since Vietnam

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

Amidst an array of domestic problems and a 13-day-old war in the Persian Gulf, foreign policy dominated President Bush's State of the Union Address Tuesday night.

Speaking from the House Chamber to 535 members of Congress, a handful of diplomats and other visitors, Bush reiterated the United States' reasons for involvement in the Persian Gulf War, which began Aug. 16, and the troops' resolve to see it through.

"The war in the gulf is not a war we wanted," Bush said. "We tried every diplomatic avenue and Saddam Hussein, time and again, flatly rejected the path of peace."

Bush said his intentions in the Middle East remain the same — to drive Iraq out of Kuwait, to restore Kuwait's legitimate government and to maintain stability in the region.

This means the total destruction of Iraq is not the goal of the ongoing military effort, he said.

"We do not seek the destruction of Iraq, its culture or its people," Bush said. "We seek an Iraq that uses its great resources not to destroy, not to serve the ambitions of a tyrant, but to build a better life for itself and its neighbors. We seek a Persian Gulf where conflict is no longer the rule."

Most Americans knew instinctively this could not happen without a military aid from the United States, he said. Hussein had to be stopped sooner rather than later.

"We are the only nation on this earth that could assemble the tools for peace," Bush said. "This is the burden of leadership."

The audience saved its most adamant and lengthy applause for Bush's comments on the commitment of the troops deployed to the Persian Gulf.

"There is no one more devoted, more committed to the hard work of freedom than every soldier and sailor, every marine, airman and coastguardman, every man and woman now serving in the Persian Gulf," Bush said to precede a standing ovation that lasted several minutes.

In light of the recent war, protests all over the country and the bitter and lingering memory of Vietnam, Bush said the American people must support the men and women serving in the gulf. That commitment must equal the soldiers' commitment to their country.

War protestors, however, were not condemned by Bush. Instead, he defended them by saying they are exercising their right to freedom of speech.

"Democracy brings the undeniable value of thoughtful dissent," Bush said. "We've had some dissenting voices here at home. But the fact that all voices have the right to speak out is one of the reasons we've been united in purpose and principle for 200 years."

Bush was careful in addressing the problems of violence the Baltic republics. The situation will be monitored with great interest, he said. His objective is to help the Baltic people, not to punish the Soviet Union.

"We will maintain our contacts with the Soviet leadership to encourage continued commitment to democratization and reform," Bush said.

Linda Richter, professor of political science, said Bush's statements on foreign policy were the most eloquent parts of Bush's 45-minute-long speech. She said he was able to handle the current problems in the Baltic republics.

"He balanced that well," Richter said. "He didn't hold out any false hopes to the Baltic states. I think it's good that he attempted to keep his relationship with Gorbachev and at the same time asked for more reforms."

The strong stance on foreign policy was wobbled a bit by an inconsistent domestic agenda, she said, and Bush failed to tie in the gulf war with the economic problems the United States faces.

In his address, Bush said he was optimistic about the economy. Among his proposals is a blueprint for a new highway system, a comprehensive national energy strategy, which aims at finding greater use for alternative fuels, and a bank reform plan to aid sagging financial institutions.

Bush said everyone has a responsibility to speak against racism and bigotry.

Richter said, however, this is inconsistent considering Bush vetoed a civil rights bill last year. Bush may be more likely to accept civil rights legislation this year since a considerable portion of the troops serving in the Persian Gulf are minorities.

Returning plane not defecting

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An Iraqi transport plane, one of an estimated 90 aircraft to take refuge in Iran, has returned to Iraq, congressional sources said Tuesday.

The sources, who spoke after receiving a military briefing on the Persian Gulf War, said they did not know whether the plane was military or civilian. Nor did they describe its mission or passengers.

The return flight has helped persuade U.S. analysts that the fleeing planes are not piloted by defectors in the 12-day-old war, said the sources who asked not to be identified by name.

Separately, one congressional source said damage inflicted on Iraq's elite Republican Guard forces by allied bombing had been "light" thus far. The source added that about half the country's chemical weapons capacity has survived the massive allied bombardment. Stocks of chemical weapons are hidden and their location is unknown to U.S. intelligence, said the source.

Iran has vowed to remain neutral in the war, and has said the Iraqi planes won't be permitted to leave until the conflict has ended. Administration spokesmen have said they take Iran at its word.

Threat of chemical warfare not new

Millions of chemical casualties in WWI

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

The war in the Persian Gulf has turned the threat of chemical warfare into a reality. At a moment's notice, network news people are seen donning gas masks and chemical warfare suits due to the threat of incoming Iraqi missiles.

Chemical weapons are not a new problem and have been around since the turn of the century.

In World War I, 90,000 soldiers were killed and 1.3 million wounded through chemical warfare.

The United States and the Soviet Union alone have stockpiled over 70 million tons of chemical weapons since World War I.

The chemical agents used in chemical warfare are divided into three groups: blister agents, nerve agents and blood agents.

"Blister agents are the most effective and have the longest duration of the three classes of chemical agents," said Sgt. Bradley Hicks, an instructor for Nuclear, Biological and Chemical School at Fort Riley.

Mustard gas is the most widely used blister agent and was used by Iraq in the Iran-Iraq War, Hicks said.

Burns, blisters and temporary blindness are the effects of mustard gas, said Edward Spiers in his book "Chemical Weaponry." Mustard gas is lethal if absorbed through the skin in high quantities or by inhalation.

"You'd almost have to see pictures of what this does. This stuff is really nasty," Hicks said.

All blister agents are persistent, remaining in an area for more than 10 minutes. Some blister agents can endure in an area for several months, Hicks said.

Weather is the main factor in determining persistency of a chemical agent. Sunlight is a natural decontaminant, which evaporates the chemical agent, and wind and rain can increase the area affected, Hicks said.

"Nerve agents can be absorbed through any pore of the body, starting with the respiratory tract, the eyes and then the skin," Hicks said. "Basically, nerve agents overload and shorten out the nervous system."

Low dosages of nerve agents will cause dizziness, runny nose and dilation of the pupils. At higher dosages, it will cause vomiting, involuntary defecation and urination, convulsions, paralysis and finally death, Spiers said.

"When people start doing dances they don't normally do, that's a good indication they've been contaminated by a chemical agent," said Sgt. Carter Williams, an NBC instructor.

All soldiers are equipped with nerve agent anecdote kits of two self-administered syringes. Soldiers are also equipped with pyridostigmine bromide pills. PB pills cause the same mild symptoms of nerve gas but are time released, Williams said.

"In layman's terms, it's much like taking a flu shot. You're actually injected with a small concentration of nerve agent so you're actually immune for a short period," Williams said.

Blood agents are the most deadly of the three types of chemical agents. A soldier's ability to get his mask on in time is the only means of protection from blood agents.

There is no anecdote, he said. Hicks said all U.S. military units possess early warning devices to alert them to the presence or absence of chemical agents in the environment.

The M43A1 Automatic Chemical Agent Detector Kit is an alarm system that constantly samples the air and gives a visual and vocal alarm, Hicks said.

All units also possess M8 and M9 paper. M8 paper reacts with the environment and is a chemical agent identifier. M9 paper also gives a reaction, but does not identify specific agents, Hicks said.

"I really feel the U.S. troops are the best protected and best equipped," he said. "We've all had the chance to go through the live-agent training center at Fort McClellan, Ala., where they use the nerve agent, of course, in a very controlled environment. You have a chance to see these devices working."

Chemical warfare has become an international threat for many nations. In countries like Israel, citizens always carry their gas masks.

Mali government accused of torture

LONDON — Amnesty International on Tuesday accused the government of Mali of torture, ill-treatment and illegal detention of political prisoners, including children.

The London-based human-rights group said many youngsters, some under 12 years of age, have been severely beaten, left outside for long periods in the heat without water and deprived of adequate food since mass arrests took place Jan. 18 following riots in the West African nation's capital.

In Mali, as in many African countries, people have staged protests against one-party rule. Gen. Moussa Traore's Democratic Union of Malian People, which has governed the former French West African colony for 22 years, says it can incorporate all shades of opinion, making pluralism unnecessary.

NASA delays next shuttle launch

CAPE CANAVERAL — NASA's next shuttle launch is being delayed nearly a week so workers can replace three bad thrusters used to steer the ship in orbit, officials from the space agency said Tuesday.

The military mission had been targeted for late February but now is scheduled for early March.

Two of Discovery's 44 thrusters are leaking and another has a bad weld, said NASA spokeswoman Lisa Malone. Three new ones will be installed Thursday, followed by several days of hook-ups and tests.

The steering jets are vital for the upcoming mission, which is dedicated to Defense Department work.

During the eight-day flight, Discovery's astronauts will use the steering thrusters to maneuver the shuttle into unusual positions. Then the ship's re-entry engines will be fired so a satellite temporarily placed in orbit can observe the rocket exhaust plumes.

Kansas celebrates 130th birthday

TOPEKA — Kansas observed its 130th anniversary of statehood today with a Statehouse cake-cutting ceremony led by Gov. Joan Finney.

Finney spoke briefly to about 200 school children gathered in the first floor rotunda, then cut the first piece of cake and signed autographs.

"I think it's just tremendous we've got the children of Kansas here to observe the 130th birthday of the state," Finney said. "We're going to see that in the future she's going to continue to grow and be strong."

"If we bring out the best in you (children), then we'll bring out the best in Kansas."

She asked the children to remember Kansas servicemen and women serving in the Persian Gulf, and held up a cake that carried an inscription honoring men and women of the four services. "Our prayers are with you all," it said.

Man blames television for murder

KANSAS CITY — A man who said voices on television told him to kill his 72-year-old mother was charged with first-degree murder Tuesday.

Michael Quick, 33, was charged in the Sunday night beating death of his widowed mother, Ethel Quick.

Police said Quick, who lived in the basement of his mother's home, told officers he beat her to death after voices on television instructed him to kill her because she suffered from Alzheimer's disease. Officers said Ethel Quick apparently did not suffer from the irreversible neurological disorder.

The son was arrested Sunday night after a man called 911 and matter-of-factly reported the killing. When police arrived, Quick was standing outside the house with his hands in the air and was arrested without incident.

The victim was found in her bed, where she had been beaten several times on the head with a baseball bat. Police spokesman Don Ash said the victim had also been struck in the left arm and hand with a hatchet.

Police found a bloodstained baseball bat on the floor and a hatchet in a tool box. Ethel Quick's small dog also was found beaten to death near the foot of her bed.

Combat pay excluded from taxes

TOPEKA — Kansas troops serving in the Persian Gulf will not have to pay state taxes on their combat pay, Gov. Joan Finney said Tuesday.

Combat pay is specifically excluded from federal adjusted gross income and therefore is not taxable in Kansas.

Revenue Secretary Mark Beshears said state law allows military personnel stationed in a combat zone, or hospitalized as a result of injuries sustained in a combat zone, to file tax returns six months after they return to the U.S. or are released from the hospital.

Troops stationed outside the United States but not in a combat zone will be allowed an automatic two-month extension for filing their state tax return.

Combat pay is additional pay troops receive for serving in a combat zone.

Hays police rule death accidental

HAYS — An autopsy could clear up questions about the death of a 22-year-old victim apparently involved in a hit-and-run accident, police said.

Hays police Chief Lawrence Younger said Tuesday the death of Curtis Claycamp of Mankato was classified as accidental.

Claycamp died Sunday in a Wichita hospital after suffering head injuries in a Friday night accident at a Hays apartment complex.

There were no charges or suspects in custody, he said.

3 men charged with kidnapping

LEAVENWORTH, Kan. (AP) — Three men were charged with kidnapping five people at a Linwood home in a weekend domestic dispute, police said.

David T. King, 24, of Bonner Springs, was scheduled to make his first appearance Wednesday at the Leavenworth County District Court Courthouse on charges of aggravated burglary, aggravated kidnapping and three counts of kidnapping.

Warrants also were issued Monday for two other Bonner Springs men, ages 29 and 30. They were not in custody as of Tuesday evening.

Police said three men armed with a rifle or shotgun forced their way into the Linwood residence and held five people at gunpoint.

An investigator said it was a domestic dispute, but would not give other details until all the suspects are arrested.

Students battle stress together

Biofeedback process monitors signs of changing temperature, heart rate

S. KATHERINE DIETRICH
Science/Health Reporter

It begins each morning with the alarm clock shaking you out of bed. That's the first of 50 to 200 stressors your body will react to each day.

Art Rathbun, counselor at the University Counseling Services, said those stress-inducing situations can create an unhappy physical condition.

High blood pressure, irritable bowels and migraine headaches are just a few of the physical problems that are associated with high stress levels, Rathbun said.

But the student isn't left to combat stress alone — Rathbun conducts workshops in stress management each semester.

K-State has provided stress management services for its students for at least 10 years through its counseling staff. It began when Dave Danskin, former counselor at University Counseling Services, began stress-related services in the 1970s. He worked with Elmer Green and Alyce Green, researchers at Meninger Foundation, who pioneered biofeedback techniques for stress management.

Biofeedback is reading the body's signals. Skin temperature, heart rate, muscular tension and other body system functions are measured. Changing measurements indicate the body recognizes stress, even if the mind doesn't perceive it.

Rathbun's two-hour workshops are descendants of the first programs conducted about 15 years ago. They are starting points for many students in learning how to recognize stress and how to deal with it effectively.

After determining exactly what stress and stressors are, biofeedback is defined and the techniques are introduced.

The key to effective stress reduction, however, is learning how to change those bodily reactions.

Once a client tries biofeedback in the workshop, individualized sessions may be needed. Such assistance is available through Rathbun or other counselors trained in biofeedback techniques.

For some students, stress is localized around test taking. Special sessions are available with Rathbun expressly for outwitting test-taking jitters.

Almost everyone has developed sensitivity to taking tests, Rathbun said. It can start in childhood at school, or in a social setting where a performance of some type is expected.

Unfortunately the lesson learned is to react with stress. Rathbun said this can result in panic that keeps the student from accessing his memory.

Sometimes the entire ability to perform is short-circuited. The stress prevents the student from acting in his own self-interest.

Rathbun uses a combination of relaxation strategies and desensitization techniques to retrain the anxious student.

During the four workshop sessions, he may guide students to relax, then simulate a stressful situation, then relax again. The student learns to control the anxiety reaction through practice.

These methods are also helpful in reducing stress during lectures and study sessions. Preparing for the test can cause the student to freeze long before the test is administered.

With practice ahead of time, the student can master his reactions before they master him.

University Counseling Services provides detailed, free brochures on stress management and test anxiety for students who want to learn more before attending a workshop.

Counseling Services offers group therapy

S. KATHERINE DIETRICH
Science/Health

This is the first in a series of three articles about the University Counseling Service's support groups and workshops.

At least 17 topics are covered by the various groups in the University Counseling Services.

According to John Robertson, psychologist at the counseling center, the groups number from six to nine students. Groups help students face stressful problems together with the guidance of a counselor.

More intensive therapy sessions are available for groups that need the active intervention and input of the counseling professional.

Robertson also noted that student stress tends to be seasonal, from around Thanksgiving to about spring break.

Records from the counseling center are kept in strict confidence. Without written permission, records cannot be shared, even with Lafene Health Center's staff or parents.

For more information about group sessions, contact the University Counseling Service at 532-6927.

Financial aid woes worth it for many

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

Although the process of applying for and receiving financial aid may be time-consuming and frustrating, it is necessary.

David Horsley, junior in radio/television, said he has received financial assistance since the fall of 1988. He said he turns his applications in on time, however, his checks are not always ready when he enrolls.

Larry Moeder, assistant director of Student Financial Assistance, said there can be problems, but if a student gets lucky and doesn't have to be verified and turns in the application(s) on time, there should not be any problems.

Moeder said 30 percent of all applications are selected by the government for verification of accuracy about income and taxes. About 50 percent of accepted applications, he added, have to be re-processed because the student made an error on the form. This is where most of the delays and frustrations occur.

If a student is unsure of what financial assistance he is eligible for, they can just ask one of the employees at the front desk or speak with one of the telephone operators. They people can answer general questions and direct the student to the proper forms.

If students or their families have any in-depth questions or unusual circumstances that may not conform to the application, they may have a private consultation with a counselor. Moeder said, however, the student and family are encouraged to go through all the instructions first. An example of an unusual circumstance would be if the income of a parent or the student changed, or will change, significantly from the previous year.

To apply for this aid, the student must fill out the ACT Family Financial Statement (FFS) and turn it back in by March 15. All the applications received by March 15 are ranked in order of need, and students with the highest need are awarded money first.

After this first process, some funds like the College Work Study Program, the Perkins Loan and the Supplementary Education Opportunity Grant Program (SEOG) run out.

This semester there is remaining money for Pell Grants and Stafford Loans, Moeder said.

For scholarships, the student must complete the Kansas State University Scholarship Application. This must be submitted to the financial aid office in Fairchild Hall by Feb. 1.

Moeder said it is not necessary to complete any other forms. Also, grants and scholarships do not have to be repaid.

Financial aid, academic departments and colleges determine which scholarship(s) the student is eligible for. This is determined by academic merit, performance ability, leadership involvement and good moral standing.

Moeder said K-State attempts to help those students with a grade point average of 3.8 or above. However, the financial help is not guaranteed.

There are several brochures available in Fairchild that can help interested students determine what financial aid they are eligible for.

College of Engineering gets boost for scholarship program

KIMIS HATJITIMOHEADIS
Contributing Writer

The College of Engineering received a $125,000 pledge from Hal and Mary Siegle, K-State graduates.

Hal and Mary Siegle committed the money as part of the University's Essential Edge Campaign.

Hal Siegle said that he and his wife always wanted to make a meaningful gift to help support K-State.

"I hope all graduates will take advantage of similar opportunities to support the University and the campaign," said Siegle, who is also the chair of the $18-million campaign in the College of Engineering.

Don Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, said the gift will help the University's scholarships tremendously.

The gift includes funds from the couple and matching support from the Exxon Educational Foundation.

"Mr. Siegle worked for Exxon as a top executive for many years, and if you give money, they match," Rathbone said.

A part of the gift, $25,000, is to be used for programs designated by the dean of Engineering.

"I may use part of the small undesignated part for salaries and other special programs, but I haven't finalized my decision yet," Rathbone said.

Hal Siegle earned a degree in chemical engineering from K-State in 1947.

"We will first make sure that chemical engineering students will be the recipients," Rathbone said.

He said that the campaign is a five-year program that started two years ago and has now received gifts of about $10.5 million up to now.

"We definitely know we want good students to be benefited, but we may be a little bit flexible," he said.

Hal Siegle is the chairman of the advisory council for the College of Engineering. He also received the college's Distinguished Service Award in 1978.

Mary Siegle earned a degree in biology from K-State in 1948.

The couple have been members of the KSU Foundation's Benefactor's Circle donor club and serve as regional chairpersons from the President's Club donor group.

First impressions still shape world today

What my mother always used to say is true: First impressions are important. Let me offer this story as evidence: One evening a while back I was walking on campus. The air was cool, but it was nice enough that I had the front of my jacket open.

Underneath I wore a Grateful Dead shirt, one of those unmistakable tie-dyes with a picture of a skull on it.

It was fate that I was wearing that shirt on this particular evening. As I came around Seaton Hall toward the K-State Union, I ran into a man similarly dressed in his own Grateful Dead shirt. I nodded to him as we passed each other. But once past, he turned back and called, "Excuse me."

I turned around and reached into my pocket for a pack of cigarettes. I was smoking, and I figured he wanted one. But when he came back toward me he just said, "I like your shirt, man."

"Thanks," I answered, "I like yours." We stood facing each other. I noticed that he looked quite a bit like me. We were about the same height and build. We were both unshaven, and we both had brown hair. I even recognized his rather shy, almost guilty hands-in-pocket stance as one I sometimes catch myself at when I'm looking in a mirror. In fact, looking at him was a lot like looking at myself in a mirror.

I was thinking of the Heart of Darkness thing. I felt like I was observing the man I might have been. We seemed like reflections of each other. For the duration of that cosmic instant we were the same man. I was "Eric" and he was "Eric," but we each seemed to represent "Eric" after he had been through two very different sets of circumstances. One set was my life. The other was his.

Neither of us made a move. Did he see it too? I was searching for something to say. Despite our other physical similarities, the shirts were obviously the core of our situation.

"How many concerts have you been to?" I asked. It didn't matter to me, but I thought it might be what he expected me to ask.

"Couple," he answered, looking at the ground.

I looked at him again. There was something else in him, too; something not like me. He looked shaky and cold, even though it was pretty nice outside. I managed to register that it was just possible he was coming down off of something when he asked, "You couldn't help me get some buzz, could you?"

Buzz? I had to ask him to say it again. Buzz. I think he said "Buzz."

Well, I knew what he was after. I admitted that I didn't know where to get any "buzz" in this town. I implied that if we were in any other town I could probably help him out, though it wasn't true. I was saving face, I guess, semblance of a Deadhead that I was.

"It's gettin' tough," he said, knowing that I could relate. Then, when he was sure, he went away.

It's a true story.

I should say, I suppose, that I'm not a Deadhead. I say so out of respect for the real Deadheads, the people who followed the band in its original incarnation. I wasn't aware of it when it was happening; I was too young. But I now regard the Deadheads as folk heroes.

I don't even wear the shirt that much. I like the records, and because it was a good friend who gave me the shirt for my birthday, I'm sentimental about it. And prone as I am to spilling coffee down my front, I don't like to run the risk of ruining it.

But it was clearly that shirt that formed the bond between me and the man I met that night. And it was clearly that shirt that led the man to ask me if I could help him out.

And, the man must have reasoned, who better than another "Deadhead" could help him get high. Was it an unreasonable assumption? I mean, we still carry a lot of stereotypes about rock'n'roll and its relationship with drugs. But there's also a lot of stories that reinforce those stereotypes.

I had never seen him before, and I haven't seen him since. But when we met I was judged to be a Deadhead by the way I looked. That first impression set the stage. Everything that followed seemed at least reasonable on the basis of that perception.

And amazingly, even I made an attempt to play the part through. I, who knows next to nothing about drugs, tried to "save face" by assuming the role.

What my mother always used to say is true: First impressions are important. But why do we so unthinkingly nurture stereotypes based upon them? It's not the first time I've been asked if I experiment with drugs. Some people seem to expect it of me when they see my long hair and find out I'm an English major.

What other signals do I send out to people whom I don't know? And what misconceptions of people do I have, based solely and unfairly on their physical appearances the first time I see them?

These questions seem especially worthwhile this early in the semester. Every day I catch myself relying on first impressions and the stereotypes they unfortunately encourage.

My impressions of fraternity guys and sorority girls are especially telling. Being outside of the greek system, I frequently classify those involved in it as different from me.

Yet, I've never met a greek that fit my stereotypes of greeks as a whole. As a matter of fact, I have some good friends who are involved in fraternities and sororities. None of them are so unlike me.

We are, all of us, similar in many respects. We profess the value of the individual. But even as we stress the individuality of every human being, we cut each other short by forgetting the differences (and similarities) that we can't see. We are the same because we are different. It's part of what makes us human.

In a very real way, we are all of us reflections of each other. It seemed profound to face "the man I might have been" in the person of the man I met that night. But then, what person wouldn't I have been, had the circumstances of my life and upbringing up to now been those of anyone else?

Who knows what persons lie within us, made inactive by the conditions of our individual lives? As people, we are more alike than we sometimes think.

Still, I wonder how many of my stereotypes slip through my defenses. It's difficult to fight against dysfunctional behaviors we have internalized. They're comfortable, and they become a part of us.

But although it may be easier to accept stereotypes in ourselves than to change them, who can justify holding onto impressions that are so often inaccurate and unfair? They affect us all. Each of us employs them, and each of us is at some time a victim to them.

I'm only grateful that in many instances my first impression was not my final impression. We are richer for all of the friends we make and for all of the people we know.

Maybe every relationship has its start on some physical level. But any relationship built entirely on appearances is, like beauty, only skin-deep.

Editorials

Grain of salt necessary for media war coverage

While a war amongst nations is being played out in the sands of the Persian Gulf, a war between the media and "Big Brother" is brewing as well.

The news media covering Operation Desert Storm have been plagued with censorship from every angle.

The U.S. Department of Defense, the Saudi Arabian government, the Iraqi government and the Israeli government have been and will continue to censor every sound bite, video clip, typed word, printed photograph and uttered sound that derives from the war zone.

This action can be, arguably, a commitment to national security, or a violation of the people's right to know.

It is true that certain photographs or video shots could illustrate troop and military weapon locations, but shots of planes landing and missiles being fired merely lend credence to what the world assumes is taking place.

The censorship of material destined for the eyes and ears of concerned citizens around the globe is only beneficial to those who are champions of the censors' cause.

Saddam Hussein is censoring everything that leaves Iraq, so that he and his military are placed in a favorable light. At the same time, he is releasing as much information as possible to condemn the aggression against his country.

Hussein has ordered all foreign journalists out of the country, except one. Peter Arnett of CNN has remained in Baghdad. Although it could be argued that Arnett is serving CNN and its viewers as a dedicated journalist, he is merely a puppet to Hussein and a channeler of the information Hussein wants to be seen and heard.

Hussein is not the only violator of the American right to a free press, though.

The anti-Iraq coalition governments are all leading the charge as well. American, British, Saudi, Israeli and other world journalists have been restricted in their coverage of the war.

Everything we have seen and heard from the gulf has painted a pretty rosy picture of what is happening, at least for the anti-Iraq coalition.

We have seen numerous planes return with their pilots waving their thumbs-up in the air. Small sparks of light travelling towards the heavens and small explosions of lights beyond the clouds are Patriot missiles destroying Scud missiles, or so we are told.

To keep the support up at home, these are the images we see. Additionally, the facts we hear are about minimal casualties and sweeping success. To bolster the hatred for Hussein, evidence of his destruction is highlighted on the news and in the newspapers every day.

Pictures of birds soaked in oil struggling to stay alive are seen again and again with claims that Hussein flooded the seas with Kuwaiti oil. How do we know that a missile from an American ship didn't stray off course and rupture a pipeline or refinery?

The messages we see and hear every day about the war have been cleared and neatly groomed for the benefit of the censor. Listen to what is said, look at what is happening and think about what might lie ahead. Remember, however, the news you receive is not as pure and unbiased as the news you read and see in America about what happened in Anytown, U.S.A.

Meaning known

Editor,

On a news broadcast last week, one of the stories was about a girl in grade school in rural Kansas who was tying yellow ribbons to every fence post along the road by her farm. When asked why she was doing it, she explained that she cared about the soldiers in Saudi Arabia and hoped they would return safely. It is ironic that a child in rural Kansas can comprehend the symbolism of the yellow ribbon, while the K-State Faculty Senate cannot.

Other war persists

Editor,

While talk of war with Iraq continues, the so-called "War on Drugs" here in the United States is a continuous battle that we are losing. We must not forget our own domestic battles while engaging in others thousands of miles away.

Drugs such as crack are tearing our society apart just as much as, or more than, political issues over oil. Bush's strategy of increasing law enforcement and prison space ($1.5 billion for prisons, which is a 100 percent increase) is failing.

Instead of focusing the majority of his $10 billion budget on punitive assistance, Bush would be better off allocating more to drug education. Not only would stronger drug education help to reduce drug abuse at a national level, but also here at K-State.

It's time drug education classes were made mandatory. Otherwise, we'll continually fight the war on drugs with ignorance and not intelligence.

As Jann S. Wenner said, "Like Vietnam, this is a quagmire. We are in a war that is tearing apart the fabric of our country. There is no light at the end of the tunnel. And it is time to admit we are wrong. And perhaps we can behave as a kinder, gentler and more mature society."

War opens issue

Editor,

Every protester against the war I have talked to supports our troops. All of them believe the best way to support the troops is to bring them home as soon as possible. Most protesters now expect the war to last more than a few weeks. All hope it doesn't. If the war lasts longer, we may be able to save the lives of Americans (and others) by protesting.

No protester I have talked to supports or defends Saddam Hussein.

Most protesters believe that the situation in the Middle East will be made worse by the war. They believe the war will make us more enemies and will not make the governments there more humanitarian or democratic. We hope that after the war we can win peace, but we do not believe President Bush's policies will do so.

I think Bush believes he is doing the right thing. I also think he is dead wrong. The president's actions seem to indicate that he thinks the best way to bring about a new world order is to use the threat of nuclear weapons to maintain a Pax Atomica, to make the United States the world policeman who wields a nuclear stick. I don't think this will work. So as long as we maintain nuclear weapons, there will continue to be proliferation. If more and more countries obtain atomic bombs, sooner or later they will be used. No one knows whether or not a nuclear war would destroy the planet, but it appears that we have the weapons to do so.

Attempts to eliminate all nuclear weapons will not come voluntarily from Bush or any other political leader in a nuclear power without strong public pressure. The talk of the danger that Hussein might obtain an atomic bomb and/or that the Israelis might use their nuclear weapons may have alerted more people to the need to eliminate all nuclear weapons and establish international inspection to assure no more are constructed. The end of hostilities may provide the best chance there has been since Hiroshima to obtain an international agreement to destroy all nuclear weapons. We can help lay the groundwork for such a treaty now.

We can also work to reduce our military expenditures and redirect our efforts and resources toward providing better education, housing, child care and attending to many other domestic needs. We could also help other countries solve their problems and stop trying to force our inept policies on them as we are still doing in Central America.

Perhaps we failed to stop this war because we found it too unpleasant to face the issue soon enough. When citizens do not participate in a democracy, power corrupts the country's leaders. The best intent of leaders cannot long maintain peace, justice and good government without the participation of the public.

U-LearN serves as link to resources

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

There is one simple number at K-State that will give you access to everything you want to know, said Kenyon Madden, director of U-LearN. The number is 532-6442 and it's U-LearN — the University Learning Enhancement and Resource Network.

Located in the basement of Holton Hall, U-LearN is primarily staffed by volunteers and supervised by a paid staff of six. It is funded by Student Senate and University Counseling Services.

Volunteers answer questions ranging from commonly needed phone numbers to obscure facts and trivia.

Madden said U-LearN is K-State's connection to everything.

"We can either tell them the information or get them hooked up with the people that know it," Madden said.

U-LearN is in the process of training new volunteers for the spring semester. The volunteers are given a tour of the U-LearN office and shown the resources that are available to them for use when answering a question.

Judy Starr, senior in apparel design and co-coordinator of U-LearN, said the common questions vary during the semester.

Starr said questions concerning enrollment were common at the beginning of the semester.

"People also call on game nights and want to know the game time and whether or not it is televised," said Starr.

Laura Birrell, co-coordinator for U-LearN and senior in journalism and mass communications, said callers frequently ask for the last day to drop a class.

"During finals they want to know when their finals are," she said.

Starr and Birrell both said many unusual questions are asked by callers to U-LearN.

"We had someone call and ask if a platypus had teeth," said Birrell. "We found out that instead of teeth they have hard ridges."

About 50 volunteers work at U-LearN during the semester. Volunteers are asked to work at least one hour a week at a time convenient to them. The phones are staffed from 9 a.m. to 10 p.m. Monday through Thursday and 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Friday.

"There is also the availability to help people complete their community service projects for DULs," Madden said.

Madden said that phone calls to U-LearN have doubled from last year and estimates they receive 4,000 a month or more.

He said it surprises him that U-LearN receives calls from K-State graduates who are working or living in foreign countries.

"When war broke out in the gulf, we had soldiers from Fort Riley stationed in Germany calling us to find out information about the war," Madden said.

Kansas overcomes start, finishes strong in victory

Failure to sustain early effort dooms Wildcats in defeat

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

Kansas rebounded from poor shooting and turnovers in the first half to explode to an exceptional second half of play and post a 78-69 win over K-State Tuesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Trailing 30-26 at halftime, the Jayhawks made up their minds they wanted the victory, and promptly showed the 13,606 fans why they are ranked No. 24 in the nation.

Early in the second half, Jeff Wires gave K-State a two-point lead on a conventional three-point play, and Kansas' All-American candidate Mark Randall picked up his fourth foul.

The fans went wild, and the chances for K-State to get its first victory against Kansas in Bramlage in three tries looked promising, right?

Wrong. Instead, the Jayhawks would come back to get their eighth-straight win in Manhattan.

Over the 5:48, following Randall's fourth personal, Kansas went on a 21-6 run to build a solid, 14-point advantage, 59-45. During that stretch, Adonis Jordan nailed two treys and Richard Scott added three buckets to lead the Kansas scoring.

From that point on, K-State would get no closer than seven points, and that was with only 22 seconds remaining.

"Defensively the first half we played awfully well, and gave up 26 points. Defensively the second half, we were as bad as we could get, and Kansas took advantage of that, ran the ball down the court and scored 52 points," K-State coach Dana Altman said.

Bad defense was exactly what it was. K-State began a hackfest that led to 16 second half fouls, and put Kansas into the automatic two-shot bonus with 9:29 left in the game.

KU 78, K-State 69

"(In) the second half we are apparently not getting any leadership on the floor, and defensively we are not putting things together," Altman said.

K-State looked as if it was ready to record its first conference victory in five tries during the first half. The Wildcats opened the game with tenacious defense, and held the most dangerous Jayhawk threats silent.

Randall and Terry Brown combined for only six first half points, but ended the game with 12 and 11 points, respectively. Instead, it was junior forward Alonzo Jamison that owned the Wildcats. Jamison kept the 'Hawks in the ballgame with 12 first half points. He ended with 20.

Carlessness on the offensive side led to 10 Wildcat turnovers in the first half and contributed to a smaller halftime lead than Altman believed his team should have owned.

"We had some chances to get a little bigger lead at half, but those eluded us. We should have executed a little better," Altman said.

K-State saw its lead swell to as much as eight in the opening 20 minutes on two different occasions. The second came with only 2:46 left in the half, but the Jayhawks ran off the next six points to close within four at halftime.

Kansas tied the game at 32 for the first time at the 17:49 mark in the second half. Brown canned his second three-point bomb five shots later to give the 'Hawks a one-point lead that they would not relinquish.

K-State closed the gap to 59-50 on two free throws by Jean Derouillere, who led K-State with 20 points, but the final wind was stripped from the team's sails when Wires was whistled for his fifth foul only 20 seconds later at the 7:13 mark.

The loss dropped K-State to 10-8 on the season, and 0-5 in the Big Eight. Kansas moved to 13-4 and 3-2.

"We have to regroup. It hurts to lose at home with everybody behind us," Wires said.

Hazim, Randolph honored

Senior guard Nadira Hazim was honored Monday as the Big Eight Conference's Player of the Week after leading the Lady Cats to two victories last week.

In Saturday's 78-72 overtime win over 23rd-ranked Oklahoma State, Hazim scored a game-high 29 points and had 10 rebounds, three assists and two steals.

Thomas Randolph was honored earlier this week as the Big Eight's male track athlete-of-the-month for January.

The sophomore is undefeated in the 55-meter dash this season and recently turned in a provisional national-qualifying mark of 6.24 seconds.

Jamison again stars vs. 'Cats

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

Alonzo Jamison probably wouldn't mind it much if every Big Eight game he played was against a team in purple and white.

For the second-straight contest against K-State, the 6-6 junior forward from the University of Kansas overshadowed his more-heralded teammates and led the Jayhawks to a win over the rival Wildcats.

Jamison scored 20 points and pulled down 10 rebounds in the 78-69 Jayhawk triumph.

The point total was just three off his season best, and the 10 rebounds tied his career best. He logged his third double-double of the year in the process.

He entered the game Tuesday averaging just 9.5 points and six rebounds a contest.

"This might have been my best game ever," said Jamison in a crowded KU dressing room. "The rivalry really gets you going."

It sure has Jamison's adrenaline flowing. In last year's KU win in Lawrence, Jamison had 12 points and three rebounds in just 15 minutes played. But it was his second-half defense in that game on Jean Derouillere that drew more raves than his offensive prowess.

Yet it was his defense—or lack of effort on that end of the floor—that had Jamison upset after the game Tuesday.

"I think I could have played defense better against Derouillere," Jamison said.

Derouillere, who scored 20 points but had just eight in the second half, was a little more generous.

"Alonzo is a very big guy," Derouillere said of the 225-pounder. "But he's a big guy who's quick also. He did a good job."

K-State coach Dana Altman also noticed Jamison's efforts.

"He had a great game and did a good job against us," Altman said. "He's a pretty good player."

Jamison took his offensive output in stride.

"That's the way this team is," he said. "I think almost everyone in here could score in double figures. It doesn't matter who shoots the ball."

Nonetheless, the noted defensive specialist was happy to score. But he knows his role.

"I'm trying to do a good job of doing what Coach (Roy) Williams wants me to do, and that's play defense," he said.

Williams said the efforts of Jamison and his teammates defensively in the second half may have been the best he's seen by the Jayhawks this season.

"The second half could have been one of our best halves of the year," Williams said. "Basically, I thought we played pretty well defensively."

And it was Jamison, who twisted an ankle in KU's workout Sunday night, who was leading the way again for the Jayhawks, even on one good wheel.

He's probably got Feb. 16 circled on his calendar already. He gets to play another game against a team in purple that day.

Overcrowding problem rears head

Dan Wicker

Sports Reporter

Last week, I wrote an article on the beginning of intramural basketball games. If you happened to miss it, then you have probably been quite surprised at the number of students using the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The rec complex is feeling the pinch of the overcrowding due to intramural basketball, cold weather and the fact that most students want some form of exercise.

If you wandered up to the complex Monday and found yourself frustrated because you could not use any exercise equipment or a court, then you were not alone. There were 4,007 other students in the same boat.

This marked the first time the rec has jumped over the 4,000 usage boundary, and if you count all the spectators watching basketball Monday night the number swells to 4,299. The previous high was 3,411 students.

It seems that there is no relief in sight.

"It is overwhelming to realize our responsibility and try to figure out how we are going to meet the needs of all these people," said Joyce Halverson, assistant director of recreational services.

The time available to meet those needs is seriously dwindling. Basketball games run Monday through Thursday from 5 p.m. to 12 a.m., 4 to 7 p.m. Fridays, 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. Saturdays and all day on Sundays, leaving only two courts for pick-up games.

Aerobic exercise also commences from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. during the week, and at that time there is only one basketball court open.

But if you are a rec complex regular, you know basketball courts are not the only place suffering from overcrowding. It nearly takes a reservation a day in advance to reserve a racquetball or handball court, and the wait to get on exercise equipment runs about an hour.

"Every year at this time we have a few 3,000-user days because one, the weather forces people inside; two, the demands of academics haven't hit full tilt yet; and three, intramural basketball," Halverson said. "But my student staff is telling me, 'Joyce it is worse than I ever remember it.'"

"We are not discouraging people from coming out here. We love to see the people, but we are simply overcrowded," said Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services.

I would like to remind everybody that is frustrated with the problem that the rec services provided a solution in the form of an enlargement referendum last semester. Those of you complaining about the overcrowding that did not vote or voted "no" because you could not afford three bucks a semester have no right to moan.

And I know there are some out there. Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said a survey was conducted proving that 78 percent of the student population use rec services.

Rec services is hoping for another referendum sometime this semester to double the size of the complex so they can better service the students of K-State.

"That is still top of the list as one of our priorities for the semester. One of the things we want to do is work with Student Senate and find a solution to hopefully get another referendum," Robel said. "The need is there and the numbers continue to go up."

The first referendum was thrown at the students at an inappropriate time. Cuts were being made across the board at K-State, and the thought of many people was that the money could be better spent. But now those fights have calmed, and the rec complex is still fighting its problems.

I know that exercise and fitness is continually growing in demand, especially for people in college. Everybody wants to look better and feel better. The services are here for our use, but it is becoming harder and harder to use them.

I urge students to voice their opinions.

Lady Cats set to face KU in matchup of Big 8 rivals

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

Lady Cat coach Susan Yow is not quite sure what to think of the rivalry but she knows it's importance.

"I know about this K-State, KU rivalry," she said. "Right now I'd say the standings don't mean that much. They are important, but the real separation of the teams at the top won't begin until next week. Right now we just have a big game with our rivals."

That game will be at 7 tonight at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

The Lady Jayhawks have quietly put together a 13-5 mark and a 4-2 conference record to tie them with K-State, Nebraska, Iowa State and Oklahoma State for the conference lead.

"Well we've seen them a lot on tape," Yow said. "They are a very athletic team. They have a lot of Nadira Hazims. They are a very quick team, and we're going to have to defend against that."

"They like to take the ball to the hoop. They predominately rely on their inside game."

Yow also said the Lady Cats are going to have work on not telegraphing their own passes and concentrate on shutting down the passing lanes for KU. But she also added that K-State needs to dictate the tempo of the game.

Entering her 18th season as KU's head coach, Marian Washington has come to expect this kind of season from the conference.

"Right now, I'd have to say that this is a typical year for the Big Eight," Washington said. "We've been working hard toward this kind of season. This game will obviously be very emotional. K-State is coming off a very big win over O-State and they are going to be carrying a lot of momentum coming in here."

Washington pointed out the Lady Cats leadership will be a very difficult task to handle.

"They have a lot of experience and leadership with the seniors," she said in reference to Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim. "We have to focus on more than stopping Miller. They also have Hazim playing well and the play of Mary Jo Miller speaks for itself."

The winner of this game will have a better shot of winning the conference, a fact which was noticed by Washington.

"It will definitely leave someone at the top," she said.

The most noticeable stat on KU's starting five is that they have 249 turnovers for the season.

"The turnovers are not indicative of the way we've been playing," Washington said. "We've had some very physical games and that has been the cause for the turnovers."

"Right now we're trying to get into a defensive set that is consistent," she added, "a defense that will cause the other team to have a lot of turnovers."

On attempting to stop the K-State offense, Washington said the Lady Jayhawks will probably go with a little man-to-man defense, with it switching every now and then to a zone.

"They're so balanced offensively that it's really hard to say what we'll do," Washington said. "But we'll do our best."

The two teams have split the last four regular season contests. K-State is leading in the series, though, 35-21.

Move of ROTC camp may affect economy

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

The ROTC Advanced Camp, normally scheduled for Fort Riley, has been moved to Fort Lewis, Wash., because of the deployment of the 1st Infantry Division for Operation Desert Storm.

Fort Riley has hosted the advanced camp since 1974 and in the past has drawn more than 2,300 cadets and an additional 900 military personnel to Fort Riley, Capt. David Liese, head public affairs officer, said.

Gary Skidmore, assistant public affairs officer for the Third ROTC Region Headquarters, said the move will not have a significant effect on the area economy, but Dean Campbell, military-affairs bureau chief for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, disagrees.

"Anytime you don't have the amount of people that you'd normally have in an area, it's going to affect the economy," Campbell said.

Although he said he doesn't feel the effects will be severe, Campbell said they may be felt in the lodging, restaurant and entertainment fields.

"The cadets stay on post until the weekends, and then they may go into town where they might rent a room or go see a movie," Campbell said.

Fort Lewis will also be receiving cadets from Fort Bragg, N.C., which is the only other post to be a host for an advanced camp.

An estimated 5,500 cadets are expected to attend this summer.

The camp will now contain 17 different cycles of cadets and will be run for seventeen weeks because of the increased numbers from other camps, Liese said.

"Normally the camp will last seven weeks, and there will only be seven cycles of cadets," Skidmore said. "Since Fort Lewis will be the one and only camp, every other day a new group will come in and a group will leave."

At this time, no plans have been made for 1992. Liese said the move isn't a permanent situation, and the camp will move back to Fort Riley as soon as the 1st Division returns from Operation Desert Storm.

Shelter offers help for homeless

By the Collegian Staff

In the cold, bitter weather many people in Manhattan are faced with the problem of where their next meal is going to come from and where they'll sleep at night.

The Manhattan Emergency Shelter, Inc., 813 Leavenworth, offers food and a place to sleep to people who are homeless for one reason or another, said Jacque Gibbons, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology, social work and member of the board of directors at the shelter.

These people find themselves homeless for many reasons. Perhaps they are transients who are moving to a new location, they've lost their job, have mismanaged their finances or are having family problems, Gibbons said.

At the shelter all people are referred to as guests, he said.

Gibbons said transients usually stay for three or four days, just requiring warmth and food; homeless residents usually require more time and assistance.

"There are a number of special programs and services the shelter provides besides basic food and shelter," he said.

The shelter provides a life skills program which offers eight different classes for their guests, said Kathy Rankin, executive director of the shelter.

These classes include apartment hunting, job preparation, budgeting, GED testing, parenting, nutrition, stress and time management.

The shelter is working on a new program, transitional housing, which Rankin referred to as a step from an emergency shelter.

When guests obtain employment and income, they can move from the shelter to an apartment

Volunteers help local programs

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

Be a friend to someone who needs you.

Compeer is a program that finds volunteers in the community to spend time with recovering mental health clients, said Mary Alice Schlesener, Compeer coordinator at Pawnee Mental Health Services in Manhattan.

"Mental illness is a lonely disease," Schlesener said. "There is still a lot of stigma against the mentally ill."

"Many of the mental health clients have no family or friends they can talk to," Schlesener said. "Many of the clients have little or no self-esteem, and friendship can help them recover."

More than 100 Compeer programs in the United States are recognized by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Resources and by the American Psychiatric Association, Schlesener said.

The program has been in Kansas since 1985 and Sedgwick County has one of the largest programs in the nation.

Compeer began in Riley County October 1990.

Pawnee Mental Health therapists refer clients, who are at least 18 years old, to Compeer on an individual basis.

Recovering mental health clients fill out applications including information about their interests and what type of volunteer they would like. Then the application must be approved by the case manager or therapist of the recovering mental health client.

After signing a one-year contract, Compeer volunteers complete five hours of training regarding the diagnosis or medication of clients.

When an application is approved, a volunteer and a client are matched up to do various activities for at least an hour every week.

Manhattan's Compeer program needs college-aged men to volunteer because there are currently more women volunteers, Schlesener said.

"Presently, there are 22 volunteers but we need six male volunteers to match up with six clients," Schlesener said.

Two Compeer volunteers said they are glad they are involved with the program.

Maureen Pierce, junior in psychology, said she became a Compeer volunteer in October 1990 and the first meeting with her client was really awkward.

"I knew she had a problem, but the ice soon broke and we got along fine," Pierce said. "Now the meetings are really pretty relaxed, and we have become pretty good friends."

She said she normally spends a couple of hours a week with the client seeing movies, going for walks, eating lunch and just talking.

"I would definitely recommend it because it is therapeutic — not just for you, but for the other person as well," Pierce said.

Janice Baker, junior in psychology, said she began the Compeer program in October 1990 also. She said it has been a great experience and has learned a lot about people who have to cope with mental health problems.

"We have become pretty good friends. I would definitely do it again," Baker said.

Dark portraits shine in 'Grifters'

Shocking novel turned into daring film about con artists

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

In the past couple of years, Hollywood has started a seemingly irreversible trend.

Movie studios, in order to cash in on the value of Oscar nominations, have been releasing films they think have a good chance in "selected markets" during December. Then, weeks later, the movies are released nationally in hopes that they will still be showing when the nominations are announced. "The Grifters" is one of those movies.

Black Lizard press published Jim Thompson's novel "The Grifters," along with many other books of the same underground genre, in post-World War II America. What these generally overlooked authors lacked in storytelling, they made up for with stark, shocking subject matter. Thanks to screenwriter Donald Westlake, "The Grifters" is now a stirring character study with a real focus.

John Cusack plays Roy Dillon, a young man who plays the "small con" for a living. He cleverly swindles money from bartenders, gamblers and anyone else he comes in contact with by simple slight of hand. His mother, Lily Dillon (Anjelica Huston), places illegal bets on horse races for the Mob.

The two are briefly reunited in the hospital, as Roy recovers from a victim's punch. Their relationship starts to unravel for the viewer as Roy checks out and, against the wishes of his mother, whisks off on a trip with his girlfriend, Myra Langtry (Annette Bening).

The plot careens wildly from here,

Reviewer says ...

see it now
— before it's too late

going from one extreme to another. Rather than basing the story on the interworkings of their scams, director Stephen Frears chose to explore what goes on inside the characters' minds. Grifting involves a set of values that is totally foreign to the working public. Roy, Lily and Myra have trouble with one of the simplest aspects of social behavior — trust.

Roy maintains that he "might go straight" throughout the movie. Lily seems to want out of the business, but only because her boss catches her skimming money from him. Myra turns out to be experienced in grifting and she wants to set up a large-scale scam with Roy. Things get very tense toward the end, and bizarre plot twists start to make sense.

It's good to see John Cusack get away from his "teenage-sex comedy" stereotype and tackle a more challenging role. He portrays Roy as a confused man, suspicious of everyone and everything.

Huston, though, has the most complex role. Lily is absolutely fascinating — confident but completely lost. The story, by its jarring completion, turns out to be more about Lily than anyone else. She faces a personal reckoning and must figure out what she believes.

Unfortunately, "The Grifters" will probably garner more Oscar nominations than audience members. It's the kind of motion picture that restores my faith in the ability to constantly experiment with film. If the rest of the movie-going public felt the same way, however, "Home Alone" would not be the top grossing movie in the nation.

Go see this movie at Westloop 6 before it's gone. Trust me.

Homeless

Rankin said they go through a test period to see if they can make it on their income.

"This makes the transition easier from shelter living to independent living," she said.

Before the guests can stay at the shelter they must sign a list of rules.

These rules include a curfew — 9 p.m. weekdays and 1 a.m. on weekends — and no alcohol, drugs or smoking in the house.

The guests must be out of bed by 9 a.m., fix their own meals, practice good personal hygiene and do chores around the house.

"It's like their own house," Rankin said. "They have to take care of it."

The number of guests that stay at the shelter varies, Gibbons said.

"We see several thousand over a course of a year," he said.

The city of Manhattan and the United Way provide 45 percent of funding for the shelter. The other 55 percent is given by local churches, independent groups and grants, Rankin said.

Russian sci-fi thriller thrill-less

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

If you close your eyes you won't miss anything but the sub-titles, and they don't help anyway.

The Russian film "Solaris" is a sci-fi psychological thriller. This previously unreleased version of the film in its entirety will be shown at Forum Hall Wednesday and Thursday at 7:30 p.m., and at 3:30 p.m. Thursday. "Solaris" is based on a novel by Stanislaw Lem. The story takes us to new depths of reality in which the sub-conscious plays a much more important role than the conscious. And according to one of the scientist characters who killed himself out of desperation or shame, "It has something to do with conscience."

More importantly, it seems to director Andrei Tarkovsky, the film is about colours, shapes and lines, a sort of cinematography which hypnotizes the eye and dulls the senses into a purely emotional understanding, if any at all.

The film repeats the images of the starkness of the space station interposed with the richness of the landscape of the Earth.

The film taunts us for over an hour with the promise of an explanation of anything. Then we begin to comprehend that no one really knows what's going on, and that, "To perceive basic truth we need mysteries." And yet, "When a man is happy, the meaning of life and such questions don't interest him."

I don't know about the questions or the meanings, but I do know that this film didn't interest me, at least not once I realized that none of the difficulties it presented would clear up. I was overwhelmed with the vagueness and the sense that I was missing something.

The acting is superb. Of course it's in Russian. The visual effects of the film are worth a glance. The soundtrack includes a few Bach pieces. But if you were looking for a sci-fi thriller, or even the secrets of the Russian space program, you won't find them here.

"Solaris" offers only an ocean which explores all the little islands of your memory.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Apple introduces the Macintosh LC.

Bride's calendar for a formal wedding

This is a tentative schedule of what should be done before the wedding and about how long before the event.

6 months

- Buy a wedding planner and a memory album.
- Discuss wedding budget with both sets of parents and fiancé.
- Decide on wedding style, flowers, food and cake.
- Decide on wedding and reception sites.
- Plan color scheme for wedding and reception.
- See clergy member or judge with fiancé.
- Plan reception and make reservations.
- Choose and order dress and accessories.
- Select and register china and silver.
- Begin guest list.
- Choose attendants.
- Plan new home and begin shopping for it.
- Consult a travel agent for honeymoon ideas.

3 months

- Complete guest list
- Order invitations and announcements; start addressing them as soon as possible.
- Arrange transportation for wedding party.
- Order wedding rings.
- Set date to order attendants' dresses and confirm delivery date.
- Hire a photographer.
- Complete honeymoon plans.
- Plan ceremony, reception details including organist, caterer, florist, etc.

6 to 8 weeks

- Buy groom's gift.
- Mail invitations.
- Have portrait taken, (optional)
- Choose attendants' gifts.
- Pick up wedding rings and check engraving.
- Plan lodging for traveling guests.
- Plan bridesmaids' party.
- Discuss rehearsal dinner with groom.
- Write thank-you notes for gifts.
- Send announcements to newspapers.
- Have final dress fittings.

2 weeks

- Get license
- Get appointment at hair dresser.
- Check honeymoon reservations.

1 week

- Begin honeymoon packing.
- Purchase traveler's checks.
- Arrange to move belongings to new home.

Preparation key for formal plans

Up to 6 months of planning may be needed for details

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

Good planning is important to any wedding. A formal wedding may take six months or more to plan.

"I started planning nine months before," said Denise Warta, senior in education. Warta was married to Chuck Warta, senior in agricultural economics, last June.

"We both planned the wedding together," Warta said. "At least we tried to."

Starting early was an advantage for Warta's wedding.

"We were both in college and our parents were at home," Warta said. "Communication between my parents, Chuck's parents and us at school made the planning a little harder."

A wedding planner is a must for any bride-to-be. Planners give ideas and suggestions about wedding etiquette, photographers and other general information.

"I got a planner right after I got engaged. It was a lot of help,"

What to include in wedding invitation

- Name of host/hostess.
- Wedding couple or guest of honor.
- Date.
- Time frame. (For example, 1:30-4:30 p.m.)
- Travel directions.
- Phone number.
- R.S.V.P. deadline.
- Shower theme.
- Necessary information, such as colors of kitchen if kitchen shower.

Warta said.

Details are important when planning a wedding. Finding the right music, organist, flowers and photographer may take time. Talking to friends and attending bridal shows can help when planning.

"Buying my dress was one of the hardest things for me," Warta said. She said she went to bridal stores in four different towns before finding her wedding dress.

Accessories need not outshine bridal gown

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

After the bridal gown and bridesmaid's dresses are chosen, then accessories become a factor of choice.

Even if the bride may already have some ideas about what accessories she would want to wear, it is best to wait until the gown is chosen.

Rosa Jones, Elita Johnson and Kim Rippel all agree accessories are all a matter of personal preference. However, they said that one should not over-accessorize because the bride and her gown is where the attention should be focused.

Jones, who has run the Designer Boutique out of her home for four years, custom designs bridal gowns. She said that accessories are easy to pick after the gown because "it's just like getting dressed in the morning."

She also said most brides tend to wait until the gown is finished so they know just what they're working with.

Johnson, who works for Christine's — the Wedding Company, said the first things to get are those included in the traditional quote, "Something borrowed, something new, something old and something blue."

Next, one needs to choose a garter, she said, since it is custom for the groom to remove it at the reception. Necklaces and earrings are the most popular pieces of jewelry. You don't want to wear a lot of jewelry on your hands or arms because you want the bouquet to be the focal point of your arms, she said.

Rippel, a recent bride herself who has been to and involved in several weddings this year, says that "simple is best."

She said she feels that you especially don't want to overdo it with jewelry so you don't create any distractions. However, she added, if the dress is simple, a little more could be added with accessories.

The detail and color of dress should help you choose the kind of jewelry you select. If the dress is simple and a white or beige color, then pearls are a good choice. If the dress has some sparkle or iridescent colors, you would probably want to wear rhinestones or a single stud diamond.

Veils are still the tradition. However, Johnson said, blushers (the netting over the face) are almost outdated. She said this is for a number of reasons. Headpiece design and hair style are two reasons, but convenience is the main one. She said detachable ones with velcro are being used so they're not in the way.

If the bride does not prefer a veil, there are other options. Simple hair accents are now being used. There are headbands, hats, bows or even a simple pearl or rhinestone barrette. The use of hair accessories is dependent on convenience and hair style.

All three women agreed that the height of the heel on the shoe depends on what the bride is comfortable with and the style of her dress.

If the bride is not used to high heels, then it is highly recommended that they not be worn. This especially holds true if there is a reception and/or dance after the ceremony.

Jones said a lot of brides are going in the way of the ballet-slipper style for the sake of comfort. However, she said, if the bride does choose a high heel, they should not go any higher than two inches.

Johnson said pantyhose should match the color of the dress. So if the dress is white, the bride should choose a white pair of hose. Rippel said hose with decorations are always nice, but not necessary. She said when she was shopping for her own wedding most of the hose available had either a seam down the back or accents on the ankle.

Gloves are a matter of preference. Jones said whether or not the bride chooses them should depend on the sleeve length of the dress.

The bridesmaids should have similar accessories, but it is not necessary. Jones said the similarity keeps everything "tied together."

This similarity is usually accomplished by the way of jewelry, said Rippel, because the bride usually gives the necklace and/or earrings to her bridesmaids as a gift.

Jones said the brides she has worked with have all been concerned with making all the bridesmaids look their best. However, she said, they should not overpower the bride.

Gulf war taking toll on engagements

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

David Schissel and Keturah Allen were happily married on Nov. 14, 1990.

Less than two months later, David left for Saudi Arabia.

David is a member of A/4-37 Armor of the 1st Division. It is a tank division, one of the first to be used if there is a ground assault against Iraqi forces in occupied Kuwait.

"I've been watching the news religiously," Keturah said. "I feel really helpless."

Keturah, freshman in art therapy, and David had planned on getting married in September of this year, after he got out of the Army. Those plans were interrupted by the deployment of the Big Red One.

ment of the Big Red One.

But Keturah and David's marriage plans were not the only ones to be altered because of Operation Desert Storm. The chaplains at Fort Riley said they have noticed a marked increase in weddings.

Fort Riley's Chaplain Marion Pember said though he himself didn't perform many marriages for soldiers deploying for Saudi Arabia, he said many other chaplains on post did more than they would have in an ordinary time frame.

"All the chaplains together performed more weddings than they normally would have," Pember said. "The chaplain on post who performs weddings at the chapel had a significant increase."

The deployment cancelled some soldiers' plans to get married, but others who had already planned to wed just moved the date up.

"Some reservists that came here and were activated got married," Pember said. "In fact we even had one soldier who got married on the airfield just before he got on the bus to Forbes Field in Topeka."

Keturah and David had their own experience at the airfield. She said neither of them knew what to expect when he left.

"It was like we were in shock," she said. "They really didn't give us much warning. We found out when he was leaving three days before."

"There was a lot of silence around the house," Keturah said. "We were really quiet. Once he got ready to get on the bus, he said, 'This is gonna suck. I'm really gonna miss you.'"

Keturah said she has begun work at the Project Manhattan Cares hotline in the Manhattan Town Center.

It keeps her occupied, she said, and it gives her a chance to be with other spouses of deployed soldiers. It also helps pass the time.

"This seems to be going by real slow," Keturah said. "I've been watching the news, but all I hear is repeats."

But the same old news gives her no security. It was announced Jan. 27 that the ground forces would be ready to fight by the end of February.

"It's hard to know what Saddam Hussein has up his sleeve," Keturah said. "I see the news and get a little scared. I've come to expect the worst and hope for the best."

Wedding gifts need purpose

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

The perfect gifts to give the wedding party can be elusive. Should the gift be a memento from the wedding or should it be something practical for use in everyday life?

"It should be functional but special," said Shelly Holle, manager of Christine's — the Wedding Company. "The gift should be something they could use but not something they'd pick up off the shelf for themselves."

Holle suggested perfume, lin-ere, jewelry cases or traveling purses for the bridesmaids. Brides often will buy jewelry for the bridesmaids to wear with their gowns during the ceremony, she said.

Connie Hoke, employee at the Arbutnot's Hallmark Shop, said the bride may give close friends in the wedding party, such as the maid of honor, something a little more special. This may be a variation on the gift given to the bridesmaids such as a ring or necklace.

Men, on the other hand, are a little more difficult to buy for. Tej Ranotra, employee of Campbell's, suggested engraved letter openers, coin change pans or Cross pens.

Budgeting for the gifts is important, Holle said. Usually the bride and groom will spend between $10 to $20 on each attendant and a little less on the members of the party.

"The minister, organist and soloist are paid. The personal attendants, flower girl and the ring bearer should receive a special gift. The reception table servers should be given something like the attendants but less expensive," she said.

"Canisters filled with candy or gift boxes with knick knacks would be great," Holle said.

Holle said if the bride has a talent in cross-stitch, something like the wedding announcement could be stitched and framed to be given as a gift.

Holle also suggested the couple give frames or a set of frames to the attendants to later keep wedding pictures, including the wedding party and a single shot with the bride or groom.

Weddings can be both practical, original

Custom-made gowns add to uniqueness

WENDY SNIDER
Asst. News Editor

Choosing the wedding dress that is just right can be a difficult process. Sometimes after searching for weeks the dresses all start to look alike. If after trying on a number of dresses and none of them seem appropriate, the bride may choose to have a custom-made dress.

A custom-made dress is also a good choice if a desired dress is too expensive or if it cannot be found in the right size.

Bonnie Kim, a local seamstress, has had a lot of experience making wedding dresses. Her clients usually choose a design and the material for their dresses, but occasionally they will bring in a picture from a magazine of a dress they could not find in any bridal shops. Some of her customers bring in vintage dresses they would like altered.

"I don't normally use patterns," said Kim. "Sometimes, though I use combinations of five or six different patterns; sleeves from one, the skirt from another."

Kim advises that plenty of advance notice be given. The amount of time allowed to make the dress varies, depending on its complexity.

Some brides may also choose to have their bridesmaids' dresses, flowergirl's dress and the dress for the mother of the bride to be custom-made. Usually though, this requires much advance notice because of the time involved in making so many different dresses.

Kim said she usually finishes the dresses a week or so in advance so the client has time to try it on and see if any alterations need to be made.

"I also make veils, and for the groom I've made bow ties and cummerbunds. I just made a set that were polka dot," Kim said.

"I've also mended and altered dresses that belonged to the bride's mother. Some girls want to wear their mother's wedding dresses and some of these dresses are over 25 years old," Kim said. "I usually repair the dresses so they will last another 25 years."

One advantage to having a custom-made dress is that it will fit perfectly. The low cost is also a plus. Most seamstresses, like Kim, only charge for labor and the client picks out and pays for the material. Cost will vary depending on the complexity of the dress and the quality of the material.

Some brides make and design their own dresses. Dawn Lehw-Sommers, graduate student in clothing and textiles, chose to do this for her wedding. Not only did she design and make her own dress, but she designed and made her bridesmaids' dresses as well.

"It took me a semester to make them all," said Lehw-Sommers.

She said she designed them by draping material over a dress form and fitting the dress to her size.

Elegance achieved by renting bridal dresses, tuxedos; cost often half of buying same items

WENDY SNIDER
Asst. News Editor

With the worsening economy, many couples simply cannot afford a large and elaborate wedding. Often the bride's family foots a majority of the wedding bill and keeping the cost to a minimum can sometimes be difficult.

Renting is an option and allows for an elegant wedding that won't hurt the budget.

Wedding dresses, bridesmaid dresses, tuxedos and even decorations for the reception and ceremony are available for rent. The cost of a rented wedding is less than half the cost of a regular wedding.

Shannon Beier, co-owner of Marie's Costume shop, said they rent different varieties of bridesmaid dresses, wedding dresses and tuxedos.

"The tea-length bridesmaid dresses are $37.50 and the floor-length dresses are $50," Beier said. This is considerably less than the cost of buying the dresses.

Once, a couple decided to elope at the last minute and we ended up selling a $1,200 dress for $350.

—Shannon Beier
co-owner of Marie's Costume Shop

"The wedding dresses are a little more expensive. They range from $70-$150, but this is still relatively inexpensive for a wedding dress. The price does include dry cleaning and any repairs or alterations needed," she said.

Most costume shops will also sell the wedding dresses if the bride decides she would like to keep it. "Once, a couple decided to elope at the last minute and we ended up selling a $1,200 dress for $350," Beier said.

Couples cannot only rent dresses and formal wear, but they can also rent decorations for the wedding ceremony and the reception.

Sherry Goode, co-owner of D&S Rental, said they have a large collection of items to be rented.

"We rent six different types of candelabras, these and the champagne fountains tend to be our most popular items," she said.

"For brides that don't want to get too fancy we also provide paper napkins and plates in all different colors," Goode said.

Every accessory needed for both the ceremony and the reception is available for rent.

Care should be used to find photographer

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Looking for the appropriate photographer to capture a wedding in pictures is as important as searching for the perfect wedding gown.

"Look at photographs for the quality of work. Find a reputable person that you will be able to trust. And, feel free to ask the photographer for references," said Douglas Smith, owner of Heirloom Portraits.

Following these steps can help ensure that the pictures received of the wedding are what the couple expected, he said.

Leroy Burke Jr., owner of Portraits by LBJ, said often the bride will see an example of work provided by the photographers and decide to hire them for the wedding. The actual person who shows up to take the portraits, however, may be different than the photographer whose work the bride saw.

"They should be aware of what they're getting and who. The rule of thumb is that when you book a photographer, make sure you know if that photographer will be taking all the pictures. Make sure you are aware who exactly will be taking the photos," Burke said. The contract agreement between the bride and the photographer can help avoid some of the unexpected surprises on the wedding day.

Who, what, where, when and how should be included in the contract, Smith said. If these questions are answered, minimal problems should occur.

Some specific things to include are the prices of the photographs, which and whose photos will be taken, the arrival time of the photographer, and the return time on the proofs as well as the final package.

Dan Donnert, owner of Donnert Photography, said the couple should expect to see the proofs back within one week. Final prints shouldn't take longer than six to eight weeks, he said.

"Some places may take up to a month to return the proofs. It really shouldn't take much longer than between a week to two weeks to get them back. The final print return may differ with the package," Donnert said.

Couples should begin shopping around for a photographer at least one year to eight months before the wedding date, Burke said. Dates can book quickly. Most photographers who will be shooting pictures for weddings this May will have been booked last August, he said.

"In Manhattan, there are many photographers but there are also a lot of weddings. I have already had to turn down 12 weddings this year," Burke said.

Donnert said the heaviest months for weddings usually begin in May and run until early fall. By booking early, the couple can work with the photographer to guarantee they will come away with what they want.

"When we talk with them, we can get a feeling of what they like. Some may not like the cutesy shots like the bridesmaids kissing the groom. Rather, they may like

Children often ease tension

Their presence adds personality, fun to help break up wedding nervousness

CHRISSEY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Many brides-to-be worry about having children in a wedding because of children's young and unpredictable nature, but that presence may actually ease tension and add some fun.

The children who serve as flower girls and ring bearers are often young relatives of the bride or groom and are usually between the ages of four to seven.

Marti Angst, a Manhattan resident, said children are a must in a wedding.

"I definitely recommend having children as flower girls and ring bearers, it makes the wedding much more personable."

Even if the children do make a mistake most people will just say, "Oh well," and laugh it off, she said.

When asked about her wedding experience with her flower girl and ring bearer, Angst said, "They were perfect angels, we were lucky."

The decision to have a flower girl and ring bearer does carry with it some added responsibilities. What the children will wear, a flower girl's bouquet and a ring bearer's pillow are examples.

Sherry Irsik, senior in human resources management, said getting the flower girls' dresses was the most difficult part of including children in her wedding ceremony.

Irsik said she opted to have two flower girls and no ring bearer for her wedding. The girls were her cousins and since they live in Texas, the dress measurements had to be phoned in.

"I just had to hope the dresses would fit the girls, it was scary," she said.

Another decision is whether to have the children stand up during the entire ceremony.

The flower girls for Irsik's wedding were supposed to stand, one on the bride's side and one on the groom's, for the duration of her ceremony. However, in the middle of the ceremony one of the girls was too hot and began to feel dizzy. The bride's sister had to help her to a seat.

"She was so scared because she wanted to do the perfect job and felt nervous about sitting down," Irsik said. "I just turned around and said it was okay and that eased her mind."

Sheryl Taglieri, a Manhattan resident, said she didn't use a flower girl or a ring bearer in her recent wedding because it was a second marriage for both her and the groom and they wanted to keep the cost down.

"I did have children in my first wedding because although they do pose some risks, I think they can add a lot," Taglieri said.

To reduce the risks, many brides look to literature for advice.

An article in Bride's magazine suggested having the children ushered to their parent's pew after walking down the aisle to avoid fidgets. If the parents won't be there, a baby sitter should be hired to supervise the young children.

For advice about the exact responsibilities of a flower girl, brides may consult Emily Post's book titled "Emily Post Wedding Etiquette."

Post said the flower girl walks directly before the ring bearer in the procession and directly behind him when they leave the church. The girl often carries a basket of flower petals to strew along the aisle although some carry a bouquet instead.

Post's book also details the ring bearer's duties. He carries a facsimile of the ring on a white velvet or satin cushion pillow and precedes the bride in the procession.

The book emphasizes that the best way to assure success with children in a wedding is preparation.

Sheryl Taglieri agreed.

"You need to make the children understand why they are there."

Danforth Chapel provides intimacy

WENDY SNIDER
Asst. News Editor

Many couples prefer to have a smaller, more intimate wedding, including only close friends and family. Danforth Chapel on the K-State campus provides an atmosphere with all the amenities of a larger church, but on a smaller scale.

Diane Novak, office assistant at Danforth Chapel, said couples wishing to be wed in the chapel provide the minister of their choice. They usually give two to four months notice for the reservation of the chapel. They are also required to fill out a form, and upon paying a $20-per-hour fee the reservation is confirmed and held. The fee is mainly a maintenance charge.

Novak said since the beginning of the gulf crisis, the notification time has lessened.

"We've had only a couple of weeks notice lately," she said.

License process easy

WENDY SNIDER
Asst. News Editor

Many couples don't even know where to begin when obtaining a marriage license. In Riley county, though, the process is simple.

Diane Erbe, Riley County district clerk, says the couple will need to make two trips to the Riley County Courthouse, located on Poyntz Avenue.

"One or both can apply for the license," Erbe said. "This is the first trip. All we need is legal names and birthdates — it's all under oath so we really don't require proof unless there are questions."

After applying, the couple must wait at least three days before coming back to pick up the certificate. The three days include weekends, Erbe said.

Before picking up the license the couple must fill in background information such as birthplace and parents' names and their parents' birthplace. The cost of the license is $40.

After the two trips, Erbe said, ■ See LICENSE, Page 4

Commitment to common goals necessary for marriage to work

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

"Experts" on marriage and married life agree it takes much more than mutual love to hold a marriage together.

"I always say that love is a terrible reason to get married," said Kenneth Edmiston, director of Edmiston Marriage and Family Counseling, and pastor of a local baptist church. "Love alone is not sufficient. More important is the commitment. Marriages can not survive without it."

Commitment to common goals and values is as important as commitment to each other, said the Rev. Norbert Dlabal of St. Isidore's Catholic Church.

"A marriage will work when people are committed to values greater than themselves," he said.

Edmiston, who has performed more than 1,000 marriages and counsels couples every day, said that faith in yourself, your spouse and God, not necessarily in that order, is what makes a marriage work.

The most common problem expressed by couples is a lack of communication.

Often when a couple thinks they are not communicating, they are simply communicating negative things, Edmiston said.

"When that happens, a couple should go back to what they communicated when they were courting," he said, "go back to the patience and the blindness to the other person's faults you have when the relationship is young."

Jennifer Juenemann, senior in speech pathology, and Gary Juenemann, senior in business and finance have been married for eight months and are expecting their first child.

"People I know who have had problems or get divorced rush into marriage," Jennifer Juenemann said. "They don't communicate future family plans before they get married, and then it causes a big problem when they do come up."

Important future family plans include whether or not to have children and how many to have.

"We treat each other like best friends and tell each other everything," she said. "We also make sure we are completely honest and make time for each other."

With more than half of all marriages in the United States ending in divorce, it seems not enough people are listening to advice like this.

Edmiston said he attributes the prevalence of divorce to three things — economic conditions in the U.S., public acceptance of divorce and the criteria by which Americans judge marriages.

"With women's lib and more women working, women no longer depend on men and stay in a marriage for financial survival," Edmiston said. "Secondly, divorce no longer carries the stigma it once did. More people are using it as a solution to unhappy marriages."

"Finally, happiness has become today the criteria by which all successful marriages are judged," he said. "There was a time when happiness was secondary. Marriage was a social structure and raising children was a measure of successfulness."

The "experts" also agree that many people have misconceptions about married life.

"People think marriages are made in heaven, when actually most of them are made right here on earth," Edmiston said. "Couples think it is going to be more glamorous than it is. If there is no commitment the marriage will fail."

Juenemann said she agreed. "People think it is going to be easy," she said. "There are times when you feel like you don't even love your spouse. You just have to learn to deal with the problems."

Being married takes a lot of sacrifice, Dlabal said.

"You have to know that every marriage will be tested," he said. "We're not used to sacrifice. It's not really part of the American way of life."

Couples who have been married for many years continue to defy the odds.

"People I talk to who have been happily married for a long time say they never go to bed angry," Edmiston said. "It's best to handle each crisis as it comes and not let them carry from one day to another."

Larry Erpelding, resident instructor for the College of Agriculture, and his wife Donna, a local elementary school teacher, have been married 25 years.

"Keeping the lines of communication is very important," he said.

Paying for a wedding

Here is a list of the traditional assumption of expenses for those who wish to follow these guidelines. Anywhere, the expenses are often shared by both families and the wedding couple.

The Bride and her family

- The Bride
- Wedding ring for the groom.
- A wedding gift for the groom.
- Presents for the bridal attendants.
- Personal stationery.
- Accommodations for her out-of-town attendants.
- Her own physical examination and blood test.

The Groom and his family

The Groom

- The bride's rings.
- Wedding gift for the bride.
- The marriage license.
- Gifts for the best man and ushers.
- Flowers: bride's bouquets and going away corsage, corsages for mothers, boutonnieres for the men in the wedding party.
- Accommodations for out-of-town ushers and the best man.
- His own blood test.
- Gloves, ties or ascots for the men in the wedding party.
- Fee for the clergy.
- The honeymoon.
- Optional: bachelor dinner.

The Bride's Family

- The entire cost of the reception: food, wedding cake, beverages, gratuities for the bartenders and waiters, decorations, music and flowers.
- A wedding gift for the newlyweds.
- Bride's wedding attire/trousseau.
- The wedding invitations, announcements and mailing costs.
- Any fees for engagement and wedding photographs.
- The ceremony: rental of sanctuary, fees for organist, soloist or choir; sexton; carpets, canopy and any other additional decoration cost.
- Bridesmaids' bouquets.
- Gratuities to those directing traffic as well as parking costs and coat-check fees.
- Transportation for bridal party to the wedding ceremony and from ceremony to reception.
- Bridesmaids' luncheon.
- Optional: rehearsal dinner.

The Groom's Family

- Clothes for the wedding.
- Any traveling expenses and hotel bills the family incurs.
- Wedding gift for bride and groom.
- Optional: the rehearsal dinner or other expenses they elect to assume.

Wedding shower time to make bride, groom feel special

Themes can be suggested to aid couple as they prepare to begin life together

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

According to "The New Emily Post's Etiquette," a shower is a celebration distinguished by the "showering" of gifts on the guest of honor.

This version of proper etiquette for the 1970s talked about "bridal showers." Today's bridal showers are "wedding showers," which include the groom, said Shelly Holle, manager of Christine's — the Wedding Company.

Holle said an excellent book to help plan a shower is "Beverly Clark's Showers." In the book, complete information is provided on how to plan all types of showers, including wedding showers.

Usually the maid of honor or best friend hosts the shower. Sometimes, it can be planned by two or three friends. If the shower will include both the bride and groom, the maid of honor may want to share the planning and costs with the best man, Holle said.

The success of the shower has little to do with how much money the hosts spend.

Lou Walk, housemother for Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority, said the main importance is that the guest of honor feels very special.

"It's a happy and special time for the bride," she said. "You're (the host) usually nervous, but it's still a fun time. It's also a nice way to show your friendship."

Holle said the first step is deciding what you would like for the couple's shower before you check with the couple so they will know how to respond to questions about specifics, like the guest list.

"Talk to them (the couple). Say, 'We're planning a wedding shower and we would like both of you to be there,'" Holle said. "Let them know what you're planning. Then, ask the couple what's a good date and who they would like to be invited."

For example, if you let them know it will be a small gathering, then they will suggest a smaller guest list of about five men and five women.

"Although there are no hard fast rules, it's important to plan and have a time table in mind," Holle said. "Be realistic about the amount of time for the shower, but also don't be restricted to time."

A theme is usually used throughout the shower, from the invitations to the decorations.

"Decorations make it festive, but also smells and sounds help," she said. "For a beach theme, you may want to have songs from the Beach Boys or maybe a tape that sounds like waves."

Poor attendance can be prevented in several ways, Holle said. First, if the guests call and say they cannot

Origin of 10 wedding traditions

Many of our cherished modern wedding traditions, with their roots in the mists of history, are poignant reminders of the eternal nature of love and marriage. Knowing the origins of the traditions you choose to include in your wedding will add greatly to their significance and charm.

1. Why do brides wear white?

Years ago, people got married in their best dresses — not necessarily white, but whatever color was chic at the time. Red was popular during the Middle Ages in Europe. Black silk was often worn in France and England during the 19th century. Green was the color for Norwegian brides. And royal English brides traditionally wore dresses made from silver-colored cloth. But Queen Victoria advocated a return to simplicity, and throughout the Victorian era and into the 20th century brides imitate her by wearing white. Although the white dress came to symbolize purity, today white merely symbolizes the wedding itself and can be worn by anyone — including the second-time and reaffirming bride.

2. Why does the bride cover her face with a veil?

The tradition of a veil dates back centuries, when people believed that evil spirits were especially attracted to women — so they were kept veiled to trick the spirits. Over the years, the veil has come to symbolize the bride's modesty, obedience, youth and purity.

In a more romantic tradition, the first American bride said to wear a white lace veil was Nellie Custis when she married Lawrence Lewis, an aide to President George Washington. Tradition has it that she wore the veil to recapture the first time Lewis saw her and fell in love with her — as she was looking through the lace curtains of an open window.

3. What is the origin behind something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue?

This tradition also dates back to Victorian times and symbolized what the bride hopes to bring with her to her new marriage. "Something old" reflects the hope that the bride may retain the love and affection that were hers in her old life. "Something new" is for success in the new life. "Something borrowed" symbolizes the faithfulness and helpfulness of friends. Blue is the color of loyalty and consistency.

4. Why do the bride and groom exchange wedding rings?

An exchange of rings dates back at least to the Egyptians. In ancient times, the husband-to-be gave his future wife an item of value, such as a gold coin, as a sign of their agreement to be married. Her acceptance signified their betrothal. Over the centuries, the coin evolved into a ring, an unbroken circle that symbolizes the eternal nature of love, the wholeness achieved through marriage and a hope for an unbroken union. In the Middle Ages, the ring began to evolve from a symbol of betrothal to a symbol of marriage.

5. What is the origin of the bridal shower?

No one is quite sure when giving bridal showers became a common occurrence, but one charming tale has it that the custom came about when a poor Dutch miller fell in love with a woman whose father forbade the match and refused to provide a dowry. The miller's friends came to the rescue and "showered" the bride-to-be with the items she needed.

6. Why does the wedding party carry flowers?

A wedding ceremony without flowers would be unthinkable. Flowers, herbs and wheat were once strewn along the bride's path to link her progress with the symbolic blessings of nature. This is still observed when a flower girl tosses rose petals before the bride, although most often nature is brought into the ceremony in the bouquets and boutonnieres of the wedding party and by floral decorations at the ceremony and reception sites. Some say that wedding flowers are a reminder of the first wedding that took place in Eden, where all the blossoms of creation bloomed together.

7. Why do the bride and groom have the first dance at the reception?

Etiquette is behind the tradition that dictates no one will dance with the bride until she and her groom have had their first dance together. After all, the reception is in their honor, and, in a way, the first dance is their first public act as a couple after the wedding.

8. What is the origin of the wedding cake?

Cakes have been an important part of the wedding since Roman times. Sweet cakes symbolically bestowed sweetness and happiness upon an event. The grains used to bake cakes were a symbol of abundance or fertility.

9. Why do the bride and groom feed each other wedding cake?

This charming yet messy photo opportunity comes from the tradition of friendship being cemented in the breaking of bread together. The shared bit of cake is a symbol of the bride and groom's lifetime of sharing ahead.

10. Why does the bride toss her bouquet, and the groom her garter?

Tossing the bridal bouquet has to do with an ancient superstition that the possessions of a lucky person carry some of their luck. Therefore, the luck of the bride will rub off on the woman who catches her bridal bouquet, and she will be the next to marry. The garter is said to be a substitute for the ribbon a lady presented to her champion knight. The groom removes the garter from the bride's leg and tosses it to the single male guests. The man who catches it will be the next to marry.

Seating arrangements for wedding party

Most wedding receptions have a "head table" or dais, with seating reserved for members of the wedding party. Whether round or rectangular, the table is placed at the front of the reception room, with the bride and groom facing the guests. Whatever the arrangement, it's important to get up and circulate. Visit the other guests' tables to make them feel they are a part of the wedding.

Showers

make it, ask them when would be a better time. It is also appropriate to ask the couple for additional names to invite.

Holle said the date may be changed if there is a better date for the invited guests.

She said food, gifts and games are three main parts of the planning.

"You can make it as formal or as informal as you want," Holle said. "You can have a dinner or just cookies and Cokes."

Usually, the gift theme is on the invitation, which gives the guests specific details of gifts to bring. The gift theme depends on what the couple needs.

Walk said "time of day" showers are another theme to consider. Guests choose gifts for different times of the day. Their assigned time is written on the invitation. For example, tea cups may be selected for 7 a.m. or wine and wine glasses for 6 p.m.

If the couple is on a tight budget, the wedding party could be the host of a wedding shower for them, Holle said. All the gifts would be pre-selected by the couple in different price ranges at wedding stores. Some examples may be garters, shoes and a gift book.

Marriage

"It's also a good idea to have several important things in common."

The Erpeldings have an interest in education, their Catholic faith and a lot of family support in common, he said.

"Some enter marriage thinking that everything is going to be like the fairy tales, you know 'happily ever after,'" he said. "You have to realize both individuals are going to continue to change and grow, and if you're not careful you may grow apart."

Though sometimes the picture looks grim, Edmiston said he believes in marriage because he believes in people.

"In the extremes of life, commitment will carry you through when love won't," he said. "Lots of people have been married for a very long time. It just takes faith and commitment."

License

there is still one more step to complete to make the license final. It must be signed by the person who performed the marriage, whether it be a minister or a district judge.

The ceremony must be performed within six months of obtaining the license, though because the license expires after this point, Erbe said. After the license is signed it is sent to the Bureau of Vital Statistics where it is kept on permanent record.

the straightforward shots. Some may like the double exposures or filters. It's important that they make clear what they expect from the photographer," Donnert said.

Burke said the couple should also keep in mind that the photographers are human and that some mistakes may happen.

"Sometimes, some things are missed but it's not intentional," he said.

Couples learning to swing dance crowd the floor at the Ranch Saloon located on Highway 24 east of Manhattan. A six-week course teaches students to do the swing, two-step, ten-step, Cotton-eyed Joe, polka and waltz.

Ranch Saloon offers dance floor

Lessons swing to country music as popularity of sessions grows

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

Wearing everything from Reeboks to cowboy boots, eager students drift out onto the dance floor at the Ranch Saloon. Another session of swing dance lessons have started under the direction of Mary Howell. These lessons seem to grow in popularity as word spreads around campus, and the community, that country swing is the dance to know.

Students from every background and living group have been participating in the lessons.

There has been a real increase in the number of students, including younger people, Howell said, since she first started teaching dance in 1981. She said the increase could be attributed to the growing popularity of country music.

"It's different and a lot easier to dance to," said Mindy Loughman, junior in pre-nursing. "There's an art to it instead of just doing whatever you want.

The beginners get a six-week course in learning swing, two-step, ten-step, Cotton-eyed Joe, polka and waltz. There are four sessions a week that last two hours each.

It's a lot of information, but each move kind of builds on the one before it, Howell said.

"After six weeks, if people really want to dance, they'll have a handle on it provided they keep dancing," Howell said. "You

Proposal for Farrell to be revealed today

Meeting to explain space-expansion study

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Farrell Library will reveal several major proposals for possible expansion today in the K-State Union Forum Hall at 1:30.

"We are very excited," said President Jon Wefald. He would not comment any further.

The meeting will explain the results of a space evaluation study for Farrell that was conducted over the past two years and will be open to the public.

"This will be a pretty historic announcement that will affect the library for many years ahead," said Tim Lindemuth, spokesman for the library. "Farrell Library has been on a lot of people's minds for a long time."

Not the least of whom was Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock, who said in January that some major developments were in the wind. Hobrock said the library would be at capacity by 1994 if things weren't to take a turn for the better, if shelf space wasn't increased and at least 5,000 seats weren't added.

Hobrock said decades of inadequate funding have left Farrell well below Big Eight and national collegiate standards. In fact, Farrell ranks eighth among the Big Eight libraries, with more than 400,000 fewer books than the next smallest library.

But Lindemuth said things are indeed looking up for Farrell.

The architects and consultants will also be on hand today to show drawings, plans and diagrams for three possible expansion plans.

The plans, Lindemuth said, are all different and call for different expansion options.

"Some call for demolition of some buildings, some don't," he said. "I think some are better than others and some are more cost effective than others. They all certainly will be of interest to faculty, students and the public on how this will affect the University."

One drawing shows expansion taking out the courtyard that lies to the southwest of the library. It also shows the proposed changes retaining the aesthetics of the old architecture.

"It's kind of sharp," Lindemuth said. "Of course, this is only a concept. This is what it might look like. The people who did this study are strictly planners and consultants."

Lindemuth said the final say will not come from students but from the top and whichever plan is finalized, it will be a matter of years before any visible changes will be made.

"Whatever option is finally decided upon, it would be done by the regents and it would have to go to the legislature, so we're talking several years," Lindemuth said. "After things are approved and the funding is guaranteed and so forth, they have to go out and put out bids for architects to design. This isn't going to be next year."

Enrollment adjustment rally postponed due to gulf war

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

Because of the war in the Persian Gulf, the enrollment adjustment rally scheduled for today has been postponed until Feb. 9.

"With the situation in the gulf, we didn't think everyone would be focusing on this right now," said Chris Ralph, senior in political science and vice president of Primo, one of the sponsors of the rally.

Ralph said the tentative plan for Feb. 9 is to meet in the Bramlage Coliseum parking lot at 9 a.m. Then, the convoy of cars will go to Topeka for the rally at the Statehouse at 10:30 a.m.

The rally has three goals in mind, Ralph said. One of them is funding the Margin of Excellence, which Gov. Joan Finney supported in her State of the State address. The sponsors also want K-State's base budget to be fully funded.

"Without the base budget, the Margin of Excellence is basically nothing," Ralph said.

Higher enrollment adjustments are the third goal. Ralph said K-State has been treated unfairly in this aspect.

Next year, K-State will have an enrollment increase of 6.4 percent and receive about $1.9 million in enrollment adjustments, Ralph said. The University of Kansas increased only .6 percent, but will receive $1.5 million.

Emporia State University is another school hurting from inadequate enrollment adjustments, he said. Emporia State received about half of what it deemed necessary when enrollment went up 6.6 percent.

ASK will go to the Statehouse to lobby for the funds on Feb. 11, Ralph said.

Confusion caused

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

A letter distributed to international students by the Dean of Student Life Office has caused confusion and concern among students.

The letter, which was mailed to students Jan. 18, stated: "You may want to consider keeping a low profile during public gatherings and in any interactions with the press. Please understand that we are not encouraging you to limit your right of free speech, however, we are suggesting that you be mindful of your safety as you make these decisions."

The letter came on the heels of the Persian Gulf War and was an effort to help students who felt badgered by the press and federal agents. But Orma Linford, associate professor of political science, said the letter may actually do more harm than good.

"I am sure it is issued with the best of intentions," she said. "I am troubled, however, by what seems to me to be an invitation, if not advice, to self-censorship. It is a questionable introduction to democracy for international students."

Linford also said she is saddened by the events that prompted the letter, but hopes that the gulf war does not inhibit people to the point of not exercising their right of free speech.

"In a university, of all places, there should

Records broken in campaign

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

More than $72 million has been raised in an effort by alumni and friends of the University to ensure K-State's progression into the future.

The Essential Edge Campaign is a five-year, $100 million private fund-raising endeavor undertaken by the University and the KSU Foundation. It is the largest fund-raising project in K-State's history and is in its second year of fund raising. Its $100 million goal represents the combined goals of 11 projects—the eight academic colleges, intercollegiate athletics, a new art museum and University libraries.

Art Loub, president of the Foundation, said donors have set new rerecords for contributions each year, and December has been especially lucrative.

Loub announced Tuesday the Essential Edge received more than $4.4 million in December, which was the largest amount ever received in a single month.

"We're very pleased to see these results," he said. "That shows what feelings the alumni hold for the University."

The campaign received more than 3,700 contributions in December. Seventy-seven gifts were worth $5,000 or more, said Gordon Dowell, director of publications at the Foundation.

"December had historically been a large month for gifts," Dowell said.

Many people wait until the end of the year to release their gift for tax-deduction purposes and more people are in the giving spirit in December, he said.

Gifts for a new art museum have seen the highest increase throughout the fall. Contributions for the museum have jumped from 6.9 percent in June 1990, to 47.3 percent of its $4 million goal. More than $1.6 million was given to the campaign for the museum last fall.

"Most activities within the art museum have occurred in the past few months," said Rusty Andrews, associate director of the campaign. "We're really pleased with that project."

It is important that the University's art collection be brought together in one facility with good security and environmental control, he said.

"We're running quite a bit ahead of last year," Loub said. "It's no doubt we'll continue to break all previous records."

Headway made by Essential Edge Campaign

While some Essential Edge projects are getting close to their goals, others are still lagging behind. This graph shows progress of the projects in millions of dollars.

Protesters bomb allied consulates

ANKARA, Turkey (AP) — Bombs apparently linked to Persian Gulf War protests exploded Tuesday at the French and Italian consulates and near several U.S.-affiliated organizations in Turkey, injuring at least four people.

In Athens, Greece, terrorists fired an anti-tank rocket at the offices of British Petroleum Co. PLC early Tuesday.

No deaths were reported in the attacks.

Dev Sol, a Marxist underground organization, claimed responsibility for the attacks on the French consulate in Ankara and U.S.-affiliated organizations in the port city of Izmir.

The group said it was protesting the "occupation of the Mideast by imperialist forces," an apparent reference to the U.S.-led allied forces in Saudi Arabia, the semi-official Anatolia news agency reported.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the rocket attack Tuesday in Athens, but police suspect the leftist Nov. 17 group.

Last defendant strikes plea bargain

NEW YORK (AP) — The sixth and last teen-ager charged in the rape and attempted murder of the Central Park jogger pleaded guilty Wednesday to robbery in a surprise bargain with prosecutors.

The plea agreement calls for Stephen Lopez, 16, to be sentenced to 1½ to 4½ years in prison for his part in the attack at age 14.

Lopez remains free on $25,000 bail until sentencing March 13.

Senate submits Agent Orange bill

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate, on a vote of 99-0, sent to President Bush on Wednesday a bill to ensure permanent disability benefits for Vietnam War veterans suffering from specific illnesses due to exposure to Agent Orange.

The bill codifies as law what had been an administrative program of the Veterans' Affairs Department. It was passed by the House, 412-0, on Tuesday. White House officials have said Bush will sign the legislation.

Despite the unanimous congressional showing, the debate over the effects of the Agent Orange and one of its contaminants, dioxin, still lingers nearly 20 years after the last U.S. troops returned from Vietnam.

Agent Orange was sprayed by U.S. troops in Vietnam to remove jungle cover. Many veterans contend it is responsible for cancers, birth defects in their offspring and other ailments.

Solution to Parkinson's possible

NEW YORK (AP) — Experimental drugs used in rats prevented brain cell death linked to Parkinson's disease in humans, suggesting a possible approach to fighting the disease, scientists say.

The drugs blocked the toxic effects of a substance that produces Parkinson-like symptoms in people and kills the same brain cell circuitry Parkinson's affects.

But scientists cautioned that nobody knows what role, if any, this toxic process plays in Parkinson's disease. So the usefulness of drugs that block the toxic process is unclear.

Parkinson's disease is a potentially disabling condition that can include tremor, rigidity and gradual loss of spontaneous movement. It is caused by the death of specific brain cells, but in most cases, the trigger for that cell death is unknown.

The new study is reported in Thursday's issue of the British journal Nature by scientists at a corporation called Schering AG in Berlin.

They injected rats in the brain with electrically charged particles called MPP-plus, which the body manufactures from a substance called MPTP, the chemical that produces the Parkinson-like effects.

Supply of yellow ribbons scarce

WICHITA (AP) — It's getting more and more difficult to tie yellow ribbons around anything in Wichita to support Operation Desert Storm troops.

Managers of fabric and clothing stores across the city said Tuesday they cannot keep yellow ribbon available.

"At this point, I'm completely out of stock," said Steve Fortune, manager of one of three Cloth World stores in Wichita. "I think the whole company is. The manufacturers can't even keep enough supply."

At Hancock Fabrics, the ribbon sells as fast as it arrives. "I've never seen anything like it before," manager Joe Blue said.

Consumers have been asking for yellow ribbons to tie to their front doors, trees or car antennas.

Stymied in their yearnings for yellow, many residents have been buying red, white and blue ribbons instead, store officials said.

Bill aimed at halting utility greed

TOPEKA (AP) — Utility company stockholders and management officials were called greedy Wednesday by supporters of a bill concerning mergers of public utilities.

Speakers said the bill is needed to stop utility companies, especially gas and electric companies, from exploiting customers.

Consumer advocates offered their testimony before the House Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The committee will hear testimony today from the bill's opponents.

Under the proposal, if two public utilities merged, the Kansas Corporation Commission could not allow the merged company to recover any of the acquisition premium, the cost it took to buy the defunct company minus what the company was really worth.

A company also would not be allowed to recover any incentives offered to the defunct company's management to complete the merger.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Service sends fax to gulf

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Family members and friends in Manhattan can write a message to loved ones in the military who have been deployed to Saudi Arabia, and it will be received in minutes — by fax.

Operation Desert Fax is a service provided by American Telephone and Telegraph Co. allowing faxed information to be sent free of charge to military personnel in Saudi Arabia from family members and friends in the United States.

The Phone Connection of Kansas, in Manhattan, said it will participate in the program.

Tim Boller, a Phone Connection supervisor for eastern Kansas, said many family members and friends of military personnel have come into the company's phone centers asking about the Desert Fax service, so it decided to offer the company's fax machines, long-distance and phone centers as a convenient location for them.

Madeira Carpenter, a Phone Connection employee, said she has noticed a moderate increase in the number of people using the faxing program.

"With an increase in the advertising of the program," Carpenter said, "more people are finding out about it."

The information is faxed from The Phone Connection of Kansas to AT&T on the East Coast. It is then transmitted overnight to Saudi Arabia, where it is hand-delivered to the service men and women.

"Our locations across the state and near military bases, such as Fort Riley, make it easier for the family members and friends," Boller said.

Before the plan was introduced to Manhattan, the closest AT&T Center was in Kansas City.

To have messages faxed, family members and friends should visit The Phone Connection 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday thru Friday or 9:30 a.m. to noon on Saturday. The Phone Connection is located at 311 Houston in the Town Pavilion.

Draft process reviewed

Students may address concerns about reinstatement chance

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

Students with concerns about a possible reinstatement of the military draft can find out more about the draft and alternatives tonight.

The information session will be at 7 p.m. in K-State Union 208. "I'll talk about the procedures for a draft for everyone," said the Rev. Robert Hull, from the General Conference of the Mennonite Church. "Then I'll talk with anyone who wants to know their alternatives, like the conscientious-objector status."

The session is to inform students about the draft process and alternatives they may have.

"The draft has changed since the Vietnam era," Hull said. "Students' parents' experience with the draft (during the Vietnam War) is going to be different than if the draft goes into effect now."

Hull served in the Air Force during the Vietnam War and became a conscientious objector. He is a draft and military counselor and has worked with several conscientious objectors in the Fort Riley area.

"A conscientious objector is one who is opposed to military service during any war, not just to the current one," Hull said.

Since 1980 the selective service changed some of its policies concerning the conscientious-objector status. During the Vietnam War, a person could be granted objector status after filling out the documents. Now an objector has to have a personal appearance before the draft board.

Hull said the draft may be reinstated if the Persian Gulf War does not go well.

"Only if the current war continues a long time," Hull said. "A long time meaning past Memorial Day."

"Since many of the people in the military now are black and Hispanic, I see the black and Hispanic legislatures calling for a draft. This would help proportion out the military."

"We don't want to force anything on anyone, but we do want to educate students," Taglieri said.

Reservists, guardsmen on duty could terminate apartment leases

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

Reservists and those enlisted in the National Guard may be able to terminate their leases within 30 days if put on active duty.

According to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, if a tenant signs a lease while not on active duty in the military he will be entitled to terminate the agreement upon receiving orders to go on active duty.

The tenant must be assigned to active military service, must have been ordered to report for induction under the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940 or be a member of the enlisted Reserve Corps who has been ordered to report for military service.

Active military service includes periods during which the person undergoes training or education under U.S. supervision preliminary to induction, according to the Act.

Dianne Urban, assistant dean of student life and students' attorney, said the tenant must notify their landlord by certified mail after entering active military service. The termination of the lease should be 30 days after the first date on which the next rental payment is due following the date the notice is mailed or delivered, she said.

Also, according to Kansas law, the landlord or tenant may terminate a

Some fear war means end of time

BETH PALMER

Since Biblical times, people have questioned the existence of Earth and how long it's going to last.

During wars, prophecies are made claiming the end of the world is near. One Biblical prophecy portrays the end of the world as Armageddon. The Persian Gulf War has recently been compared to such prophecies.

"I think it's just another war," said the Rev. Keith Wiens, First Lutheran Church.

It's extremely difficult to interpret ancient texts with precision to forecast events happening today, Wiens said.

The Old Testament was written by people responding to situations of their times, said the Rev. John Stoneking, First United Methodist Church. He said politics of that time cannot easily be made to fit what is happening now.

The Rev. Don Walker, of New Hope Community Church, said many see end times in every event.

"Ever since Jesus left, people have been anticipating the end of times," he said.

The Rev. Gary Ward, Living Word Church, agreed the present gulf war isn't Armageddon.

"There are too many factors not

Ads more careful during war in gulf, say merchants

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

Advertising has not changed much as a result of war in the Persian Gulf, but advertisers have become more sensitive in their approach and strategies.

"A fine line exists between being supportive and capitalizing on people's sympathy," said Scott Morrill, advertising representative for Cable Ads Inc.

After showing agonized POW's, advertisers must be sensitive about what they say and evaluate each commercial on its own merit, he said.

McDonald's policy is to neither support nor advertise on any television or radio program that shows violence. The coverage of the gulf war is no exception.

McDonald's Topeka area director of marketing, Gayle Howard, said war is not wholesome and McDonald's strictly asks any TV or radio station playing their spots not to air them during war coverage.

"War is a shocking, startling event," Howard said. "I'm surprised anyone would want to advertise during coverage of the war."

It is McDonald's policy to project as wholesome an image as possible, Howard said. It is a year-round policy — not one that came with the advent of war.

Richard Wartell, station manager for KMAN-KMKF in Manhattan, said clients vary in how they are dealing with the departure of the soldiers.

Campbell's soup cancelled a national ad that had a sentence in it about the 82nd Airborne unit, which is now involved in the war, he said.

"Some clients are on the air trying to market to new audiences, while others are in a state of alarm," Wartell said. "Some advertisers are concerned the listenership will think of them as non-caring if one of their humorous ads are followed by a somber experience in the war."

She said CNN airs bumps just before commercials begin to ease the transition from the high emotions related to the war into commercials.

"Bumps are being used because of the high emotions associated with the war," said Connie Nily, advertising representative for Cable Ads Inc.

"It is a good idea to have patriotic images without trying to tag it onto the sale," Nily said.

She said, however, a little blip indicating support of the soldiers would be fine at the end of an ad.

Wartell said local advertising has changed very little as a result of the war, but some local advertisers offer discounts to dependents or spouses of military personnel in the gulf.

EDITORIAL

Techno-gadgets help fight everyday wars

"The dog, to gain some private ends, went mad and bit the man." Oliver Goldsmith, (1728-1774) Irish-born British writer.

I grew up spending my Saturday evenings at the matinee with actor Sean Connery, totally absorbed in his latest portrayal of Ian Fleming's British techno-spy, agent 007 — James Bond. Which explains why I, like a great many Americans my age (mostly male), love gadgets.

James Bond had more nifty little missile-firing cigarettes and radar-emitting wristwatches than you could shake a dual-purpose sportscar/mini-sub at. The more techno-power to the doodad, the more I liked it.

Which also explains why I find the war in the gulf, this commanding showcase of American, techno-gadget wizardry, so fascinating. "Smart" bombs, "cruise" missiles,

"laser-fired" rockets — what normal kid ... er man, can resist such tempting techno-toys? As you may have surmised, I have already succumbed to the "techno-phoria" exuded by the ongoing video-game war in the Middle East. As with our bureaucrats, I figure the best way to solve any problem is to attack it with the latest technology.

One of my most vexing personal problems has been the occasional canine that views my early evening jog down the street as a heinous affront to his territorial integrity. More than once, I have had to vigorously defend my posterior — nay, my very life, from the vicious, salivating mandibles of some eructing, masticating, growling monster from hell.

Well, no more. I am now the proud owner/operator of the latest in high-tech, hell-hound defense systems — the "Dazer" — a novel product of K-II Enterprises, Camillus, N.Y. As my techno-manual says: "The 'Dazer' is a handheld ultrasonic dog deterrent which is useful to joggers, walkers, bicyclists, the elderly, servicemen and sales people or virtually anyone who is intimidated by dogs.

"The 'Dazer' combines the latest ultrasonic technology with simplicity of use to provide the user a humane alternative to help avoid getting bitten by a dog (You obviously don't need proper grammar to be a techno-manual writer.) The 'Dazer' emits a sound wave which is barely audible to humans but can be heard by and may deter the approach of a dog or cat when properly used. The sound is not physically harmful to the animal, it is a unique and unusual sound which may be discomforting to the animal."

I have been gleefully "field-testing" this splendid piece of weaponry on every four-legged critter within jogging distance. And I must confess, just as our "smart" Patriot missiles have protected Israel from the mass destruction of the Scud missiles launched by mad-dog Saddam Hussein, my "Dazer" has deterred the most determined devil-dogs of Manhattan.

This slick piece of pulsating ultrasonic power is remarkable. I discovered, on my first field-test of the "Dazer," that it not only made Sam "the slobber-dog" across the street from my home viciously chomp his tail and shake it as though it were an eight-foot Diamondback rattler, but the device simultaneously opened five garage doors on the other side of the block. Talk about power.

And the bloody thing has got three, count 'em, three intensity levels (I lovingly refer to them as "phaser" settings) — the lowest level is "stupefy," then "stun," and finally "sterilize" (as in "geld"). In most cases, the "stun" setting has been sufficient to force the oncoming canine projectile to grab its tail and do a three-legged dash for cover.

I love it. I have even tested it on unfriendly, leashed animals out walking their masters. To the last pair I encountered, I gave Fido an "up the tail-pipe shot" with my blaster as the unsuspecting master/dog target passed by. The silly hound must have thought he was chasing a squirrel because he turned and tried to run up his master's pant leg.

The distressed fellow saw me aiming my high-tech gadget at his crazed canine and yelled, "Hey! What are you doing? Who do you think you are anyway?"

My reply, of course, "Bond. James Bond."

Lighting fades for students

Students who attempt to study in Union Station must overcome the noise of the compact discs playing and people talking. Although those distractions can be ignored, now the area's lights are turned down, not just dimmed but practically off.

Union Station, a non-alcoholic bar, was built for the students. The recently opened Union Station occupies the space which was previously the Catskeller, a place where the main purpose was a study area for students.

These study spaces were lost when Union Station was built, and study spaces on this campus are sorely needed. This leaves students with only one option — study anywhere there is space.

While the bar is an alternative to Aggieville on a Saturday night, it could also be a good place to study in the afternoon. Union Station employees should encourage — not discourage — students to study. Students studying will probably even purchase food and drinks, and paying customers should not be run off.

Look around Union Station one afternoon. You'll see the majority trying to study, not dancing on the dance floor.

So, if the lights are too low and the music is too loud and you're trying to study, talk to others. Are they thinking the same things as you? Talk to the management, explain your position. Remember, Union Station was built for you with your money.

Another perspective

One of the most prominent issues on campus concerning the gulf war is student concern about the possible reinstatement of a military draft. Not surprisingly, the anti-war movement here has taken a position against the draft. Chants of "Hell no, we won't go" ring out at almost all of the demonstrations and rallies.

But while opposition to the war is warranted, a compulsory draft at this point is necessary. However unjust the war might be, the greater injustice lies in the fact that the poor and the people of color in our society continue to shoulder the majority of the fighting.

Soldiers should be as concerned about who is actually fighting this war as they are with the prospect of being drafted themselves. African-Americans and Latinos are disproportionately represented in Saudi Arabia — current estimates show that one in every four casualties will be black. Moreover, economically disadvantaged men and women comprise a large percentage of the forces in the gulf. Meanwhile, their more fortunate counterparts continue with life as usual, suffering few consequences of this conflict.

Soldiers now on Saudi Arabia's front lines never expected to go to war when they enlisted months or years ago. Many joined during a time of peace to save money for college; others joined because they could not find a job at home. Though technically volunteers, these troops are a part of a de facto poverty draft. Military service, for many of them, was a means to a greater end and a better life, but now it may cost them their lives.

In addition to distributing the responsibility for the war among all Americans, an all-encompassing draft would make our leaders think twice before committing our nation to a lengthy, costly conflict. If the sons and daughters of our president and members of Congress were required to fight alongside the others in Saudi Arabia, these officials might act with a little more hesitation. Currently only two members of Congress have sons serving in Saudi Arabia.

Furthermore, if a draft had been implemented in August when the U.S. forces were first deployed to the gulf, public opinion might have prevailed over the arbitrary wishes of the president, and we might not be fighting now.

Admittedly, a draft cannot itself prevent our leaders' thoughtless rush toward war. But until we reach the day when the rich and poor together bear the burden of war, a draft appears to be the only equalizer.

Potential draftees scared

Over the last few weeks, I have learned much. I know what a Scud missile is, its range, airspeed and accuracy. I know that during a chemical weapon attack, shelter should be taken above ground, as the toxic fumes tend to settle quickly. I have watched more CNN than I ever want to see again, but I can't turn it off, fearing that I will miss some big news. The following are some of my thoughts.

Of course, no one involved is totally innocent or completely absolved of guilt. The United States is fighting for moral and economic reasons. Iraq has displayed naked aggression and has committed atrocious acts, but it does have a valid point or two in its accusations against Kuwait. Yes, even Kuwait is not the sacrificial virgin that many have made it out to be.

Up until the invasion, Kuwait consistently and flagrantly ignored OPEC production limits in order to reap bigger profits from its oil. This prevented countries like Iraq from making money, which in turn, prevented it from paying off its war debts to nations like the United States. That, however, doesn't justify an invasion of Kuwait.

Who do we have to blame for this mess? Everyone. Iraq, Kuwait and even ourselves. During the eight-year war between Iraq and Iran, the United States pumped a lot of military aid into Saddam Hussein's pocket. Maybe the reason we know so much about his weapons is because we bought them for him. Thank God we didn't buy him very good ones.

The question of what we are fighting for divides us more than anything else. Is it oil? Yes. And no. The role oil plays in this crisis lies squarely in the middle — much more than stubborn George Bush will admit, much less than the anti-war protesters loudly declare. No one wants to claim the middle ground, for reasons I don't understand.

We are a pampered country. It has been 125 years since a violent wartime act has occurred on American soil. It was Americans killing Americans in the Civil War. Since then, we have never seen a shell destroy our home or an enemy set foot on our continent.

We are a deprived and mournful country. The blood of our nation will pour on foreign sand for controversial and chaotic reasons. The fact that throughout history almost all of our soldiers have died in faraway countries — France, Cambodia and Panama — has to tell us something.

Controversy brews over whether news programs should show actual combat footage. A morbid curiosity overtakes many who have never encountered war in their lifetime. I'm ashamedly curious. I think they should show the horrible truth. As Robert E. Lee said, as he watched Union troops being massacred at Fredericksburg in 1862, "It is well that war is so terrible, we should grow too fond of it."

Did I say I was curious to see war footage? I'm afraid I could see the action much closer than I'd like. I turn 20 in a few days, and if they reinstate the draft, I'll be a first-rounder. So will most of my friends. I'll go even though I don't want to, even though I won't know why. That sounds like blind faith, but the reason isn't because I love my country (though I do) or because I love George Bush (I don't. I don't even trust him.)

Let me put it this way. One of my friends is dead set on leaving for Canada if the draft is called, and I respect his decision. I can honestly say that I wouldn't resent him. As for myself, though, knowing that I fled for cover while others died would haunt me.

Now that we are at war, I can admit that I'm scared. I want us to finish what we have started, now that we've started it. I want us to get it done fast, so we can get out fast. I only wish it were that easy.

weapons is because we bought them for him. Thank God we didn't buy him very good ones.

Students handle secret information

Financial aid office employees evaluate grades, money needs

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

Students working in the Office of Student Financial Aid in Fairchild Hall have the responsibility of dealing with classified information.

There are about 45 students working in the office right now, and the majority of them have access to every student's grades and financial background.

"Students sign a statement saying they will use that information only as in the course of work and will not share the information," said Larry Viterna, director of Student Financial Services.

Each employee is assigned a personal access code by the campus computing service. No one — except the person assigned to that code number and the person who assigned it — knows the number, not even the student's supervisor, Viterna said. As soon as a student employee graduates or quits the job, the access code is destroyed.

When interviewing students to work in the financial aid department, Viterna said he talks with them about their dealing with confidential items. He said he also tries to get a feel for the person's honesty.

Any student who violates this trust will be fired and their access number immediately cut off. No employee has ever been fired and only one complaint is on file.

"The director would review any situation where there is a breach of this confidence and will make a decision on the seriousness and whether it can be verified," Viterna said.

Students are told at the beginning of their employment and again at the start of each semester what responsibilities they have. They must also read the Privacy Act.

"They told us the information is to be confidential and don't take it out to other students," said Charlie Field, senior in accounting.

The information the students are working with is necessary to fill out financial forms and issue checks. Grades are posted from the previous semester so that financial aid checks can be released. The grades that show up on the computer are final semester grades and not individual test scores.

"I usually glance at the grades, but by the time you're helping the next person, you've forgotten them," Field said.

It is necessary to have this information so the employees can help the students that come in to ask for assistance.

"Without the access, we would be lost," Field said.

Houston's anthem gets national acclaim

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Robert Goulet forgot the words; Rosanne Barr should have. But Whitney Houston's rousing Super Bowl version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" could turn the notoriously difficult national anthem into a Top-40 smash.

"The calls have come in from all over the country. Radio stations have called in, the public has called in. The switchboard here was jammed for two days," said Arista Records President Clive Davis.

Houston's version, riding the patriotic fervor of a nation at war, has been released to hundreds of radio stations around the country. It may also be released to the public as a single, with a portion of the profits going to charity, Davis said.

Houston's much-praised rendition is the exception, not the rule, when it comes to warbling the anthem.

The difficult song with taxing high notes has proved more troublesome than triumphant for many who performed it in the past — a red-white-and-blue-faced bunch which includes Goulet, Barr, Johnny Paycheck and Willie Nelson, to name a few.

Little did Francis Scott Key know when he penned the poem 177 years ago that "The Star-Spangled Banner" would become a national anthem set to music few could sing.

UFM to share lectures

Program offers chance to view, discuss Lou Douglas series

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

The University for Man has scheduled showings of videotapes of last fall's Lou Douglas Lectures this semester in the University for Man Fireplace Room.

"The plan is to show the lecture on videotape and have a discussion afterward," said Karen McCulloh, coordinator of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

Lou Douglas interns will assist with the discussions, she said.

McCulloh said Molly Ivins' lecture will be shown Feb. 13; David Orr's Feb. 20; Hunter Lovins' Feb. 27 and Kenneth Boulding's March 6. All sessions will be from 7-9 p.m.

Each session costs $3, or $10 for the series, she said. The fees will help with overhead costs.

Terry Carpenter, educational coordinator for UFM, said people can register to attend UFM, by mail or by telephone with a credit card. Fees are due at the time of registration.

This is the first time UFM has shown the videotapes of the lectures, she said, but all of the lectures have been videotaped since the series began.

The idea originated to give people who were unable to see the lectures in person a chance to view them, Carpenter said.

"This is a valuable resource," she said, "for people who did not have the opportunity to attend the lectures last fall."

The Series began in 1980, McCulloh said, to honor the memory of Lou Douglas, former professor of political science, who died in 1979.

Lady Cats win pulsating OT thriller

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

Merry Christmas, K-State Lady Cats — even if it is a month late.

The Lady Cats dodged a big loss Wednesday night by pulling out a 74-73 overtime victory over the University of Kansas Lady Jayhawks.

"I don't believe it," said K-State coach Susan Yow. "I don't think I've ever seen a game quite like this."

What she was referring to was that the Lady Cats got pounded in every statistic imaginable except for the final score.

Guard Mary Jo Miller said she shared Yow's disbelief.

"I can't put it into words," she said after the final buzzer sounded. "I thought they were going to win with Kay Kay Hart at the line and no time, but she missed."

KU led 33-30 in the first half with 31 rebounds and ended the game with 66 boards.

"They just killed us," said Mary Jo Miller. "They have some leapers and they just dominated the inside."

"I still can't believe that we won."

As a matter of fact the Lady Jayhawks had two chances to win the game — once in regulation and once in the overtime period.

With 3.5 seconds left on the clock and the score tied at 67-all, Mary Jo Miller was taking the ball up the sideline. Then KU's Stacey Truitt was able to come in and steal the ball and drive uncontested to the basket.

"I can't believe that she missed the shot," Mary Jo Miller said. "She must have been worrying so much about not missing that she put it up too hard."

It was then onto overtime, where the Lady Cats took over and were able to hold their counterparts to four points.

The 'Big Bullet' was dodged, though, at the tail end of the game, with K-State leading 74-73 with 4.2 seconds remaining.

Hart was fouled by Diana Miller, sending her to the line for the 1-1. Hart missed the first end and Yow immediately called timeout.

"When we did that, the look on her face told me a lot," Yow said. "She looked nervous and worried. I knew then that she wouldn't make the second one."

Lady Cats 74, KU 73

Leah Honeycutt was able to grab the miss and K-State ran out the clock to preserve the win.

For the most part K-State found itself playing catch-up ball all night long.

"I tell you what," Yow said. "That's known as hanging tough. They came in and played a tough ballgame and were able to stick with the game even when they were down by a lot of points."

"We easily could have given up," she added. "We were down by 13 in the second half and we stuck in there."

Yow added that the team did not get a solid performance from Diana Miller — who wound up with 17 points and five rebounds — but was still able to compete.

Nadira Hazim was the leading scorer for the Lady Cats with 27 points — along with nine rebounds.

KU coach Marian Washington — who has 18 years of coaching behind her — couldn't believe the outcome of the game.

"We killed them on the boards," she said. "They just kept fighting back and fighting back and they came out on top. This is probably the toughest loss that I've ever been associated with."

Lady Cat Notes

- Nadira Hazim scored 27 points marking the sixth-straight game she has had 20 plus.
- Mary Jo Miller's 17 points tied her season high.
- KU guard Kay Kay Hart, the team's leading free throw shooter, missed a pair of charity tosses that could have tied and won the game for the Lady Jayhawks.
- KU had 66 rebounds, tying the second-highest total for a single game in school history.
- K-State has now won three straight games in Lawrence.

Staff helps television networks

Behind scenes work leads to on-air production

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

How many times has the question been asked, "Are the 'Cats on TV tonight?"

Televised basketball games lead to opportunities for basketball teams to be seen by a larger audience and for athletic departments to garner some revenue.

But without the sports information department staffs, our TV screens would probably be blank come gametime.

Many of the duties of the sports information staff depend on the TV network involved and where the game is to be seen, said Kenny Mossman, K-State sports information director.

This season, the Wildcats have three nationally-televised home games scheduled to be broadcast on ESPN; six, both home and away, on Raycom Sports Network; and seven, both home and away, on Creative Sports Marketing Network.

ESPN games are shown nationally. Raycom games regionally and Creative Sports Marketing games statewide.

Due to the large number of people who see the game, it is exciting to know the team is playing on national television, Mossman said. "Working with ESPN is one of the greater rewards of this job," he said.

He said this is the second consecutive season three Wildcat games have been broadcast nationally on ESPN.

One reason Mossman gives for this is that two of the three Wildcat home games ESPN televised last season were wins over nationally ranked teams — No. 1 Missouri and No. 3 Oklahoma.

Another reason is that ESPN, of-

Gay Mason, freelance broadcast engineer from Kansas City, Mo., is responsible for replays and advertising spots during the broadcast of 'Cats games. A crew of about 10 broadcast technicians operates inside a converted semi-trailer when Creative Sports Marketing broadcasts selected K-State games.

ten after consultation with Big Eight conference officials, considers the games slated for this season — KU, Oklahoma and Oklahoma State — to be competitive matchups.

Perhaps the most complimentary reason is that ESPN officials have told Mossman they like the atmosphere of Bramlage Coliseum and the students.

"They think it's pure college basketball here," he said.

There is a large amount of work that goes into a televised game. For instance, preparations for a game televised on ESPN begin almost two days in advance. Communication with the game producers often takes place one week prior to the game.

These preparations include writing game notes and compiling statistics for the game announcer and color analyst, preparing information on K-State to be given during breaks in the action or at halftime, and working with the network to make sure they have what they need on gameday, Mossman said.

Often, the information for breaks in the game are features on players or topics of interest currently occurring on campus.

"Basically, any information the announcer and color analyst need is compiled by us," he said.

He said this information must be detailed in order for the announcer and color analyst to feel comfortable and well-informed when they go on the air.

"It must be all inclusive and cover every base," he said.

Mossman and his staff often spend the day before the game and a portion of gameday with the announcer and color analyst to point out any information that may be helpful or to answer any questions that may arise.

"Our job is to help paint a picture for them," he said.

Games broadcast on television generate revenue for the athletic department, whether it be directly or indirectly, Mossman said.

He said games broadcast on Creative Sports Marketing Network bring revenue directly to K-State's athletic department because the game rights are arranged solely through the department.

Games on Raycom or ESPN are arranged through the Big Eight Conference office, therefore all Big Eight conference schools receive a share of the revenue, he said.

Due to the number of people and amount of equipment involved, it costs between $3,000 and $4,000 to broadcast one game, Mossman said.

He said getting a game on televi-

Former Wildcat star still works in NBA

Guard works with Denver Nuggets

BILL LANG

Mike Evans' voice is soft, and his physical stature isn't that intimidating. He's just 6-foot-1.

But don't let that fool you. Inside Evans burns a fire. A very competitive fire. He hates losing, and more importantly, he hates being told he can't win.

When people first saw him on the K-State campus in the fall of 1974, they probably didn't believe he was on the basketball team.

As for those doubters, here's something he threw back their way. Evans was a three-time all-conference player, a two-time Big Eight Player-of-the-Year — one of only two K-Staters to do so — and scored 2,115 career points.

But maybe it was the place called home that made him more memorable. Home was a place called Ahearn Field House.

"It was like a landmark," he said. "There was so much tradition in that place."

"When I first went through there as a recruit, it was like a giant warehouse. All the seats were up and it was just empty. But when the seats were put down and the season started, it was a complete turnaround. That place would be so noisy that you couldn't even hear yourself talk."

The noise didn't seem to bother Evans on his first night out, though. In his first collegiate outing he connected on 14-of-18 shots against Montana. But that didn't come easily.

"I was up for (the first game)," he said. "I went into it wanting to do well. But maybe wanting it too much. Coach (Jack Hartman) took me out early in the game, then when he reinserted me, I was much more relaxed and just did what fell in place."

Of all the things that made Evans great, it might have been Hartman's influence and teachings that helped the most.

"Mike was a pleasure to coach," Hartman said. "He was patient and listened and did as he was told."

But if there was one thing that got to Hartman, it was the style of Evans' shot.

"When we first got him he had the most unorthodox shot," he said. "But we didn't mess with it because it went in."

"To tell you the truth, Mike was a better defensive player than he was offensively. But when he got on a roll offensively, well..."

After his stellar career it was on to the pros — he was a first-round pick of the Denver Nuggets in 1978 — where new problems arose for Evans.

"In college, you had two or three guys on a team that you had to worry about," he said. "However, in the pros you had an entire team. And that was hard to get used to."

However, with the NBA being a business, it wasn't long before Evans found himself traded.

After bouncing around the NBA for five seasons he landed back in Denver — where he would finish his career in 1990 — for the 1983 season.

When the Nuggets cleared house last year, Evans was offered a job as assistant coach. He has even employed some of the techniques learned from Hartman.

"I still remember some of the things that Coach Hartman taught me," he said. "He was a defensive coach. He believed the defense could generate your offense. I try to use some of his techniques in that aspect."

Evans said, regrettably, that due to his job he was unable to make it back to the K-State campus.

If he does soon, there will likely be a few people glad to see him.

Board appoints McKee to district

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

Steven McKee was named the new superintendent of the Manhattan-Ogden School District by the board of education in a special meeting Wednesday night.

In hiring McKee, 49, the board ended a nearly year-long search following the departure of Hal Rowe in July 1990. Rowe left to become superintendent in East Lyme, Conn.

McKee said he was familiar with the Manhattan school district and community because he had worked in Dodge City for 11 years, seven of those as superintendent.

The presence of K-State was one deciding factor that led McKee to leave Woodland Park, Colo., where he had been superintendent since 1985.

"I was impressed because of the University," McKee said. "I am well acquainted with many people at the University. I hope to strengthen that relationship."

McKee said another goal is to maintain the present facilities in the school district with a limited budget. A bond election, which failed previously in the district, could be looked at for additional funding.

Although the district may need funding, McKee said it is in better shape than other school districts where he has worked. In Manhattan, he said he will build upon the strong base already established and try to eliminate any weak points, and he will use a spring retreat to establish a needs list for the district.

McKee was one of 43 applicants for the job, said Jack Hobbs, interim superintendent. A search committee sifted through the applications, leaving 11 for the board to review. The board narrowed the list to four before hiring McKee to a three-year contract to start July 1.

A native Kansan, McKee has worked 20 of his 28 professional years in Kansas, he said. He has been a superintendent or assistant superintendent for the past 21 years.

McKee is a graduate of Dodge City High School. Following this, he earned a bachelor's degree and a master's degree in education from Wichita State University in 1963 and 1966, respectively. In 1975, he earned a doctoral degree in education from the University of Kansas.

McKee is married and has three children.

Senate submits bill to reward teachers

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr said Wednesday a package of bills designed to improve the quality of education in Kansas will be introduced in the Senate this session.

A package of a half-dozen education reform measures was introduced last year, but not all of those bills passed.

"Several Senate bills and resolutions will be introduced in the next few days," Kerr, R-Pratt, said. "The purpose is to continue the process of evaluating education concepts which may be appropriate for Kansas."

One bill introduced Wednesday would allow each school district to establish a program to award cash bonuses of no more than $1,000 to teachers who are selected as outstanding teachers.

Single parents more prevalent in gulf war

Husbands, wives attend workshop to adjust to new roles after spouse deployment

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

War in the Persian Gulf has given the term single parenting new meaning.

For husbands and wives whose spouses have been deployed to the Middle East, simple things like housework, carpooling and babysitters, which were once a collective effort, suddenly fall on one person's shoulders. Children who were once reserved and behaved get taken aside at school for being too aggressive or throw unexpected temper tantrums over a missing toy.

The phrase "balancing your time" suddenly rules your life. And after all is said and done, you still have to deal with the pain of separation from a loved one for an unknown period of time.

"It's just really hard," said Tammy Potter, 24, a Manhattan resident whose husband of five years is in Saudi Arabia. "Some days I'm OK, and others I'm really not."

Potter attended a Single-Parenting Workshop Wednesday at 7 p.m. at Lee School in Manhattan.

The workshop was part of a series on parenting sponsored by USD 383 and was led by Marlies Keogh, substance abuse therapist at Pawnee Mental Health Center. Keogh has been a single parent since her husband's death 14 years ago.

Of the five single parents at the workshop, Potter was the only one experiencing single parenting caused by the deployment of her spouse.

"Before he would go on field exercises all the time and be gone for two weeks or a month at a time," she said. "But that was it. It was never for more than a month, and I was more sure he was coming back soon."

Potter said she was unsure how to talk to her five-year-old son about his father being gone or how to deal with changes in temperament and behavior.

Other parents at the workshop were widowed, divorced or separated. Keogh said that, regardless of what kind of loss they are experiencing, most people go through certain stages, or a grieving process.

Most people will go through denial first, then a period of intense anger, followed by guilt, then sadness and finally acceptance, she said.

"I don't think we let ourselves experience sadness enough," Keogh said. "There is always so much anger and guilt that we pass over that stage too quickly."

"Historically, women aren't supposed to express anger, and men are taught to hold in sadness and grief."

The unresolved feelings that result cause anxiety and family problems in the future, she said. Being in touch with emotions and dealing with them was Keogh's prevailing message.

Potter said she feels helpless because she has no control over what happens to her husband.

"One task we have when dealing with a loss is to accept that it is real, and we have no control over it," Keogh said. "This is hard for a parent who is so used to being responsible and depended upon."

Although these single parents can't control what happens in the Middle East, they can control some things.

"Parents can have fun too," she said. "You have to allow yourself to make mistakes, learn by them and not feel completely devastated."

Sharing feelings about an absent parent with the children, despite what many people think, is often necessary, she said.

Potter said she had struggled with that.

"I never know if I should bring it up or show him how I feel," she said. "I try not to cry around him, so I can be strong."

Keogh said being honest with children about how you feel and letting them express how they feel is the key.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

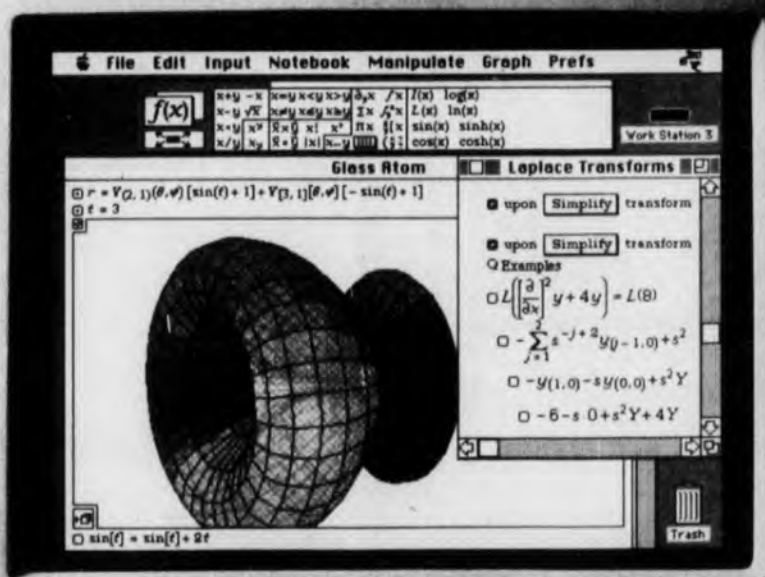

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Club members use Hams to contact police, friends

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

Fifteen Kansas State students spend many of their evenings worrying about atmospheric conditions, satellite transmissions and weather around the world.

These students are members of the Ham Radio Club.

Ham radios come in many forms, ranging from hand-held sets that can transmit up to 10 miles to radios that can transmit worldwide.

And the price range of the radios is as large as the transmission range, said Norman Dillman, professor of electrical and computer engineering and Ham Radio Club adviser. The hand-held sets cost $70 to $400, but the larger radios can cost up to $6,000.

The club has a special room on the top floor of Seaton Hall which is equipped with several world-wide radios, a large antenna and a world map. It also contains a morse code system and a computer which can be used to transmit messages through the radio frequencies.

Dillman said he has used the system to help pass messages from three soldiers who were scheduled to be deployed to the Persian Gulf to their wives.

"In all three cases it was the only time that the wives had heard from their husbands," Dillman said.

These three soldiers were scheduled to leave Germany for the Middle East and needed their wives to send them more checks. After they made contact with Dillman, he was able to relay the message to their wives in Manhattan and Fort Riley. He was also able to tell the wives the scheduled day of their husbands' departure.

But a more common use for the ham radios is for the operators to keep in touch with each other on campus. Jeff Smith, junior in electrical engineering, uses his hand-held model to communicate with his roommate. He and his fiancée have units that cost $360 and are equipped with telephones.

"It's really convenient when she has a class late at night and needs me to pick her up," Smith said.

Another convenient use is having direct access to police in an emergency, said Allen Kisler, junior in computer science and new member of the club. He said he uses his ham radio if his car breaks down or he sees an accident.

Smith said the biggest advantage of owning a ham radio, though, is getting the opportunity to talk to many different people.

He once talked to a person in the U.S. Embassy in Tanzania, and last year he contacted a Navy P3 Orion — an anti-submarine plane.

Most ham radio operators have a contact card which they trade with each other to verify contact. Similar to a post card, most have pictures on front and space for messages on back. Kisler said he hopes to collect one from every state.

The club itself has a file cabinet containing thousands of cards from various countries around the world, including a card from a Russian polar-ice station in Antarctica.

Despite the fact that the club contacts people all over the world, Dillman said foreign languages are not usually a problem.

"Most speak a little English," Dillman said. "I use the airwaves to practice my Spanish. I've called Central America and Argentina to talk."

Players prepare latest effort, 'Steel Magnolias'

Dialogue, beauty salons key components

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

The perks of being in the K-State Player's production of "Steel Magnolias" are many. During the play the six women in the cast receive several free hair stylings and manicures.

"We wash several people's hair. One person gets their hair rolled, combed and dried several times during the play," said Director Kate Anderson. "I never knew how many things it takes to give a manicure."

"Steel Magnolias," by Robert Harling chronicles the lives of six women over the course of two years.

Set designers have been working since before Christmas to obtain the unusually large number of props necessary for the production. Anderson said the set was designed so that all the props — including sinks with running water, curling irons and blow dryers — actually work.

"There's a lot of dialogue and not a great deal of movement. Trying to make it naturalistic and realistic and at the same time interesting is sort of a challenge," Anderson said. "The technical requirements and emotional requirements are also a big challenge."

Although the play differs from the movie released in 1989, the plot is similar and some of the dialogue is the same, Anderson said. The setting is the biggest difference because the play is limited to one setting, Truzy's Beauty Shop, one set whereas in the movie characters moved around freely. To the women the shop offers more than hair care, it is a place the women go to talk and share in each other's lives. Also, the male characters seen in the movie are only discussed in the play.

"Most of us have avoided seeing the movie," said Amy Strathman, junior in radio and television. Strathman plays one of the lead characters, Shelby. "We want the play to be from ourselves, not someone else's perception."

"The actresses will probably slip into the character when they are doing make-up and hair. Lots of them tend to play and relate to each other like the characters they portray," said Anderson. "This happens a lot to the two playing M'Lynn and Shelby — they relate to each other like mother and daughter off stage. They try to explore their characters."

The play will run Jan. 31 and Feb. 1-2, and Feb. 6-9 at 8 p.m. in Nichols Theater. Tickets are $6 for general audiences and $4 for students and senior citizens and may be purchased at McCain Box Office from 12 p.m. to 5 p.m. or by calling 532-6428.

Kidnap victim to be featured speaker for MACA

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Jennifer Casolo will be a featured speaker at a lecture sponsored by the Manhattan Alliance on Central America at 8 p.m. today in K-State Union 212.

Casolo made headlines about a year ago when she was arrested and put in prison by the Salvadoran police after being falsely accused of supplying weapons to guerilla forces.

After graduating from Brandeis University, she had a dream of spending a year in some Latin American country and working with the poor to help them understand poverty.

At the time of her arrest, Casolo said she had been working in El Salvador for five years as part of the Texas-based Christian Education Seminars Organization.

International outcries and solidarity efforts eventually secured her release from prison.

"What I lived through in those 18 days while I was in prison was just a little bit of what the Salvadorans live through," she said. "I consider it a privilege to be able to have shared in their suffering."

After being released for lack of evidence, Casolo said her visa was revoked, forcing her to leave the country.

Since that time, she has been touring the United States to tell people about El Salvador and the results of U.S. foreign policy there.

Marlene Howell, program-committee chairwoman for MACA, said although Casolo has become known through the larger solidarity community because of her imprisonment in El Salvador, MACA is interested in her because of her commitment to peace.

"MACA is interested in her because of her work in solidarity as a peacemaker," she said. "It is important to always be talking and hearing and dialoguing with other peacemakers of the world."

Casolo said the U.S. involvement in the Persian Gulf is either the product of failed diplomacy or the product of certain policymakers really wanting to be in a war.

"I support our troops, I just want

"I consider it a privilege to be able to have shared in their suffering."

—Jennifer Casolo featured speaker

them to come back," she said. "It's just not worth human lives."

She said in order to fight a war, you need to make the other side inhuman. The challenge of the citizens of the world is to see the human faces of all peoples in this conflict.

While in Manhattan, Casolo will meet with religious leaders, students and faculty and deliver a public lecture.

She will discuss the nature of war and the call to be peacemakers. "I will be talking about the signs of death and the signs of life," she said.

She will also discuss the continuing struggle of the people of El Salvador.

Soviets removing troops in Lithuania

By the Associated Press

VILNIUS, U.S.S.R. — Truckloads of Soviet troops left Lithuania's capital Wednesday, but republic President Vytautas Landsbergis said many sites remained occupied and warned the West not to be taken in by Kremlin promises.

The civilian death toll in the crackdowns in Lithuania and Latvia rose to 19 Wednesday when Jonas Tautkus, 20, died from a gunshot wound to the head he suffered at a military checkpoint Tuesday. One soldier also has died.

Soviet Interior Minister Boris Pugo said all paratroopers already have left the Baltic region and two-thirds of the black beret Interior Ministry troops had been withdrawn.

His statement followed an announcement by President Bush on Tuesday that Soviet officials assured him they were reducing the military presence in the region and planning to start talks.

Responding to Bush's announcement that Moscow had conveyed a willingness to "move away from violence," Landsbergis said the United States should be wary of Soviet promises.

He said a troop withdrawal could be the key to renewed negotiations with the Kremlin, but Soviet soldiers still were occupying the television center and other buildings seized violently in mid-January.

"It is regrettable that the promises of the Soviet leadership are so often broken — brutally," Landsbergis told journalists at his office.

"This is why the United States should not be satisfied that it has received promises once again. Soviet military forces have not yet withdrawn from occupied buildings of the Lithuanian state," he said.

Lithuania cannot back away from its 9-month-old independence declaration, but our relations with the Soviet Union have to be regulated, even after these bloody events, and we are ready to talk, he said.

Lithuanian officials said witnesses reported seeing troops withdraw from Vilnius, but had no confirmation any had actually left the republic.

In Oslo, Norway, Vice President Dan Quayle met with Soviet Vice President Gennady Yanayev and appealed to the Soviet leadership to avoid action in the Baltics that could reverse recent gains in East-West relations, an official said.

Scholarship deadlines near

Committees view merit when choosing award recipients

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

About 4,500 scholarships totaling more than $4.1 million are awarded by the University each year.

The priority deadline for scholarships for the 1991-92 academic year is Friday, Feb. 1. Applications can be picked up at the Office of Student Financial Assistance in Fairchild Hall.

"There's one University scholarship form that covers all the University's colleges and departments," said Larry Moeder, associate director of Student Financial Assistance. "All awards with one exception are to be made from these forms."

During the month of February, all applicants are entered into computers in the financial aid office. The office then awards general and unrestricted scholarships. Restricted scholarships, ones that are restricted to graduates of certain high schools and residents of certain counties, are also awarded by the office.

The applications are then given to the applicants' college or departments. During March and April, scholarship committees in the various colleges and departments review the applications and award their scholarships. By April, recipients are contacted about their awards.

Applicants for scholarships should be aware of additional information that is requested by certain colleges. The colleges of Human Ecology, Education, Engineering, Agriculture, and Architecture and Design require statements of professional goals, career goals or other information.

The College of Human Ecology's scholarship committee base looks for merit and financial need when looking over the applicants for scholarships.

"We give a sizeable amount of awards each year," said Karen Pence, assistant to the dean of human ecology.

Scholarships given through the college range from $300 to the amount of tuition and fees.

"I would urge all students to apply," Moeder said. "Awards are not only given to students based on GPAs. There are many performance scholarships like music and art that are given."

Applicants for performance scholarships need to check with their departments to see if there are any audition requirements.

Democrat speaker of House vows partnership with Republicans

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

The new speaker of the Kansas House of Representatives said he knows he will have to lead in partnership with Republicans, but intends to be a Democrat.

Rep. Marvin Barkis, D-Paola, for the last seven years the House minority leader, spoke Wednesday night at a gathering of Riley County Democrats at the Ecumenical Christian Center.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, introduced Barkis by describing his leadership ability.

"Marvin is a genius at building a consensus among our group. I can't think we're a cohesive group, but I can think we are a very good working coalition, and that Marvin knows how to combine the best of our House without offending people," she said.

In his speech, Barkis commented on the Democratic Party's success in the past election and said it hasn't been easy to gain control of the legislature, but the Democratic Party has made substantial gains.

"It was a very long, hard battle for us, but I will tell you that we probably—in the last two years—have raised three to four times more money than we ever raised before. We supported candidates in a way that we've never done before."

Although Barkis said he would have to lead by consensus because of the Democrat's one-vote majority in the House, he planned to advance the party's traditional agenda.

A priority for Barkis is to look at a long-time vision for the state of Kansas. He said this session will be difficult because of a new governor, the war, recession, property tax relief and funding for the Margin of Excellence.

Barkis said it is a shame the citizens in this state haven't made a greater contribution to the next generation.

"I know there's a great concern to keeping Riley County in the 2nd District, and I intend to keep Riley County in the 2nd District."

Scientists make new plastic using grain

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

Someday, the plastic bottle your shampoo comes in may be grown right here in Kansas.

In the United States, starch is currently replacing about 10 percent of the plastic in degradable-plastic products, said Dick Hahn, director of the Kansas Value-Added Center.

Hahn said that in a recent trip to Europe he found starch used in more than 60 percent of plastics in Europe.

"The new technology is sort of a giant step forward," Hahn said. "Most of what I saw was in the developing stages."

In Germany, he said he saw a shampoo bottle made from starch-made plastic. The more expensive bottle was called natural and biodegradable, Hahn said. The shampoo company said it felt it was good public relations.

Paul Neumann, research associate in grain sciences and industry, said researchers will try to establish technology in making plastics by incorporating cereal grains instead of petroleum products.

"We're proposing to incorporate starch as a greater percentage of the plastic," he said. "The main emphasis with agricultural resources like cereal grains is that they are renewable. If we're successful, we could incorporate starch at greater than 50 percent to open a market for about 260 to 425 million bushels of cereal grains annually."

He said that figure was at the level of current food packaging.

Hahn said the driving force of this research is not bio-degradability, but the use of a natural material in place of petroleum chemicals.

"Bio-degradable is a term that has not been really defined," he said.

Neumann said researchers want to chemically modify starch to make it compatible with synthetic resins. Currently, widely used plastic is resistant to water, and starch absorbs water. Making the starch less sensitive to water, will help in its compatibility with plastic.

The new technology is sort of a giant step forward.

—Dick Hahn
Kansas Value-Added Center director

K-State and Pittsburg State University are working on this cooperatively. The Kansas Value-Added Center provided initial funding along with the Kansas Wheat Commission, Kansas Grain Sorghum Association and the Kansas Corn Growers Association.

Hahn said the research is ideal for Kansas.

"Kansas has very good small plastics' industries," Hahn said. "They are logical outlets for this technology."

The businesses primarily employ about 20 to 50 people, and can be found in Council Grove, McPherson and Lawrence, he said. They manufacture various products from plastic plumbing to plastic bags.

"When you put them all together, they are a substantial industry," he said.

Kansas has the three essential components necessary for the research, Hahn said. The extrusion technology, the starch chemistry required and the plastic-formulation technology at Pittsburg State University.

They have initial funding for the first year to explore the technology and find the most promising areas for further research, Hahn said.

"It's an experimental program," he said. "It'll take time to see results."

Hahn said he hoped to find sponsorship within two years from an industry with specific products it would like to see developed.

Need for food banks increasing

Nation-wide trend affects Manhattan; report shows 200 families on aid

S. KATHERINE DIETRICH
Staff Reporter

An increase in the number of people seeking help from food banks and pantries across the nation is a trend evident nationwide, and Manhattan has been affected by it.

"Even Johnson County sees the trend," said Glenda Humbert, executive director of United Way of Riley County Inc., referring to the Kansas county that has the reputation of being wealthy enough to be immune from problems like this one.

According to the report "Hunger in the Heartland — A Report on the Current Status of the Emergency Food Delivery System in the Manhattan Area," a 33 percent jump in local commodity food distributions has been seen since 1989.

That means about 200 families each month are getting aid from Manhattan's food distribution network, said Beryl Adams, executive director of the American Red Cross.

Local food distribution has been complicated by the fact that five separate church-sponsored food pantries and at least three social service agencies are involved in assisting the hungry.

United Way is a major community fund-raiser, supporting the Salvation Army, the American Red Cross and the Flint Hills Breadbasket. Requests for assistance begin at the Salvation Army, and all requests are screened by the Red Cross.

The church pantries actually give the food to recipients. Sixty percent of their food supply comes from congregational donations of food or money. The other 40 percent comes from the Breadbasket.

The Breadbasket distributes USDA commodity foods and holiday baskets. For other items, aid recipients go to the church pantries.

Although this delivery system has worked well in Manhattan, some of the professionals felt it could be fine tuned, Humbert said.

Humbert said part of United Way's mission is community problem-solving. She suggested, and other agency representatives quickly agreed, to meet and find ways to improve their service to the hungry. They formed the Food Partners Coalition with each agency sending a representative to the meetings.

To convene the meetings, Humbert enlisted the help of John Murray, professor and department head in human development and family studies at the College of Human Ecology. He had not previously been involved with local hunger issues and was able to facilitate the meetings without bias toward any of the agencies.

"I didn't know what the answers were going to be," Humbert said. But Humbert and Adams said they were impressed with the cooperative effort that arose from the meetings.

"Oh I'm so frustrated," was the kind of comment Adams said he remembers hearing at the preliminary meetings.

But the dedication of the coalition was strong enough to keep them working through four- and five-hour meetings.

The "Hunger in the Heartland" report was the final result. It included recommendations from the agencies and pantries, aimed at themselves, for how to improve the entire delivery system.

Each agency has the choice of which changes to make and when to make them, Humbert said.

Humbert said the Red Cross has already implemented most of the recommendations aimed at its service provision. Other agencies are following suit at their own pace.

The goal of streamlining the process for the client is underway and the coalition agencies have improved communications and relationships among themselves.

"I think we've been knocking down some tough walls," Humbert said.

Humbert and Adams said the Red Cross and United Way have joined to adopt a Fort Riley unit stationed in Saudi Arabia.

Finney proposes tax relief

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — For Gov. Joan Finney, $500 million is the minimum acceptable amount for property tax relief.

Finney remained firm Wednesday in her belief that a plan must cut the state's annual property tax burden by at least that much to keep the economy from deteriorating. She also repeated her pledge to remain flexible in finding a source to finance relief.

"I'm standing by the half a billion, because it has to be meaningful to have an impact on the economy," she told reporters. "It has to have a large impact of the tax base of the people."

How to receive food assistance

1. A person must go to local social service agency and declare a need. They are then referred to the Red Cross.
2. At the Red Cross, a questionnaire and interview process determines financial and dietary needs and the length of time needed. Then they are sent to one of five church food pantries.
3. At the food pantries, individuals receive a three-day or seven-day food package that is tailored to dietary and family needs.
4. If an individual qualifies for USDA commodity foods, they may pick them up at the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

TV

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6 sion takes not only time but also a large staff. For the game against KU this week, ESPN brought in a crew of 25 to 30 people. This was in addition to K-State's staff of about 25 people.

To illustrate the number of people involved in covering a televised game, Mossman said, 111 press passes were issued for the KU game.

Usually, the network brings in two trucks the morning of the game, one containing the technical equipment to produce the game and one containing satellite equipment, he said.

Sports information department staff come in four to five hours prior to tipoff to set up the media area, check equipment and assist the TV or radio crews, he said.

There is only so much that can be done to prepare for a televised game.

There is a certain point before the game starts when everything seems to be in order, Mossman said.

"Anything that happens after that is a crisis," he said.

before and it sounded like a lot of fun," said Dawn Spivey, sophomore in pre-law, sociology and Spanish.

The types of students taking the dance lessons have changed over the years, Howell said, and the spectrum of students becoming involved is broader.

Country music is being played more on the radio and is even becoming popular among the bars in Aggieville. As interest in this type of music grows, more people are wanting to learn how to dance to it, she said.

"I always said I didn't like country music, but I was around enough of it constantly that it kind of grew on me," Spivey said.

Rental

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 3 month-to-month tenancy by a written notice within 15 days if termination is necessitated by military orders, she said.

Any rental agreement for a definite term of more than 30 days is not considered a month-to-month tenancy even though the rent is due at intervals of 30 days, according to the law.

Tenants must be aware, Urban said, that if orders for temporary duty are issued they may not necessitate termination.

Maureen Jorgenson at the legal assistance office at Fort Riley said those activated should pick up a form letter which informs the landlord of these rights.

She also said landlords really have no out-clause in the Act unless the individual fails to meet the 30-day or 15-day due dates.

"They have to comply. It's federal law," she said.

Urban said many students in the reserves can take advantage of the Act but are really unaware of its existence.

"From many of the interviews with the military that I have read, I could see they were not addressing this factor. Most of them were saying if you are in a lease you are stuck with it," Jorgenson said.

Letters

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 be an environment of free discourse and freedom of movement," she said. "The University community should be especially suspicious of actions which have a chilling effect."

The point of the letter is not the issue of free speech, said Susan Scott, associate dean of student life and one of the co-authors of the letter. Conversely, the point was to let international students know they are not alone.

"We wanted (the letter) to focus on the support groups here," Scott said. "We also wanted to reassure them that we know it's tough being far away from home and family. We want them to please understand that they're part of the U.S. family."

Scott said several students have been contacted by U.S. government officials asking about students' history and if they knew of anyone who might be a terrorist. The letter also warned students against talking to U.S. officials if they felt uncomfortable answering their questions.

FBI agents said they have been contacting Arab-American students as part of a nationwide effort to try to detect terrorists.

Center's loyalty under question

STACY HILBURN
Collegian Reporter

Loyalty was a matter of opinion at the Kansas State University Child Development Center's Board of Directors meeting last night.

The center, which is a nonprofit organization, was formed in June 1985 by parent-students and employees of K-State to serve the child care needs of students, faculty and staff.

All board members are parents themselves and have or have had children taken care of in the center. All the teachers are hired by the center, not the University.

Kellie Lawson-Conway was one of the parent-students questioning the center's commitment. She presented a letter to the board concerning the center's billing procedure.

With the current billing procedure, all those using the center's services are responsible for paying for a half-day of care even when the child is not in the center. Cindy Bohling, a center staff member, said this procedure is known when the parent signs the contract.

Lawson-Conway said she felt this policy caters more to the faculty than the students, but board member Barry Michie said the center serves the whole University community.

The billing procedure was just one of several topics presented to the board, most of which were presented without the previous knowledge of the board.

The general consensus among the members was that there tended to be a lack of communication. The members questioned the role of the board, were concerned with the impromptu topics and felt they should have more formal meetings in the future.

As a result of the topics of this meeting, the board voted to hold a closed meeting within the next 30 days. There will be another open meeting Feb. 18.

Lea Starkebaum, junior in elementary education, is a dancer who said she doesn't want to get rusty.

"I've been dancing for quite a while," Starkebaum said. "But, I like to learn new swing moves whenever I can."

The students' expectations from the lessons are mainly to learn how to dance and to have fun with their friends. They also want to be able to accept a person's invitation to dance and not feel like a klutz, Howell said.

Library proposal says $28 million necessary

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Members of a consultant team unveiled their $28 million proposal to double the size of Farrell Library at a press conference Thursday.

The proposal is a series of three options for expansion, and outlines what should be priority in bringing the library into the 21st century, said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

The new plans allow seating for 10 percent of the student body, Jay Luckner, director of libraries for Massachusetts Institute of Technology and member of the team, said.

That's 4,000 seats below what the Kansas Board of Regents recommends for libraries and well below the average space most libraries across the nation have, but still an improvement over the 856 seats Farrell now has available.

The plan the consultants deemed most viable proposes a 30-year project that would consolidate the math/physics and chemistry/biochemistry branch libraries into a new complex and renovate existing Farrell facilities.

Lucker said he had discounted many of the horror stories he heard about overcrowding at Farrell until he actually saw the building.

"Quite often in a project like this, there's a difference between reality and perception," Lucker said. "In this case, they're both the same."

Lucker said the library is, quite simply, inadequate. The number of seats, quality of seats, overcrowded shelves and an uncomfortable atmosphere have all driven students out of the library to study elsewhere.

"We feel it's a very high quality study, and we think it's a great jumping-off place for providing the library facilities the campus needs," Hobrock said.

Hobrock also commended the efforts of administration and students in getting the proposal on the drawing board. He said the efforts of SHELFA and its president, Ray Kowalczyk, initiated what has become a major item on K-State's 20-year agenda.

"We're all happy about it," Kowalczyk said. "I was hoping it would be a little less on the financial side, but I'm pleased."

Though the price tag worries some, President Jon Wefald said he was confident the funds would be obtained, be it from state or private sources.

"We're going to get this library," he said. "With this plan, we will have a library that is far more consistent, far more accessible, efficient, usable in every way shape and form. I think this consultant study is brilliant."

But to achieve the goal, Wefald said it will take a team effort from administration, deans, faculty, students and community — the same kind of effort that it took to get the library near the top of the capital improvements list.

"Just three or four years ago any kind of a library addition was down the list," Wefald said. "We have recognized that this library addition is an idea whose time has come."

Proposed Farrell Library addition

Study states Farrell must double in size

3 solutions proposed to solve current crowding problems

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

The proposals to expand Farrell Library revealed to the University Thursday depend on one thing, $28 million.

That's the figure, in 1991 dollars, decided upon by a team of architects and planners who looked at the space needs of Farrell at the request of the Kansas Board of Regents.

And now, after 12 months of study, the team has recommended Farrell be doubled in size to make up for years of growth and, subsequently, neglect.

The study shows three possible scenarios. One would require the demolition of the art building, as was originally planned by the builders of the eastside 1970 addition. The second option would either tear down or build upon Denison Hall. The third option, preferred by the consultants, the dean of libraries and Anderson Hall, would build an addition to the existing library that would butt up against the north wall of Denison, without using Denison.

Currently, there is a shortfall of about 35,550 square feet in the library. That's equal to three full floors of the existing building and leaves no room for future growth.

According to the study, by 2020, the library will be hurting for 122,250 square feet. With that in mind, the consultants gave three models for expansion.

The first would call for the building of a separate consolidated science library in which all branches and the science and engineering collections would be incorporated.

The second calls simply for an addition to Farrell, leaving all current branches intact.

The third plan is a combination of the two — build an addition to Farrell, but establish a science and technology complex within the library. This would move the math/physics and biochemistry/chemistry branches into the new complex, leaving veterinary medicine and architecture as they are. This is the plan recommended by the consultants.

This plan, however, did not sit well with members of the audience at the 1:30 public unveiling in the Union's Forum Hall, many of whom were staff of the science departments.

Nevertheless, the consultants state in their report, something needs to be done. There are areas where there is no air conditioning, no heat and no ventilation — places where there is not enough space for books or students.

Add to those problems the fact that construction and additional units built in 1955 and 1970 are actually separate from the whole, leaving library users with no sense of flow, and sometimes no idea where to go.

The planners also suggested the library should remain where it is — central in location to the University. This negates the possibility of building a completely new facility. In fact, a new building would be double the cost of simply expanding, not to mention the lack of a place to put a new library on campus.

Any expansion is a matter of years away. If the funds were available, and President Jon Wefald was quick to point out that they're not, construction would be able to commence sometime in 1993.

Objector status explained

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

The purpose of the meeting in the K-State Union was to inform those present of their right to claim the status of conscientious objector, not to promote it, said the Rev. Craig Sommer, of the Lutheran Campus Ministry.

Sommer, the Rev. Robert Hull, secretary for peace and justice in the Mennonite Church; and Cheryl Taglieri, program director of the University Parish of United Methodists, spoke to a group of about 50 last night in the Union about the draft and explained the option of being a conscientious objector.

Hull said those who want to claim conscientious objector status should start documenting their claims now.

"We recommend to our youth groups that at the point they know themselves to be a conscientious objector, they should file a statement of their beliefs with their church," he said.

"In terms of letters of support, the best letter you can have is from someone who's a veteran," Hull said. He said the letter should be a testi-

Federal army, Croatia talks end in dispute

By the Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — Croatia warned Thursday that escalation of its dispute with the federal army had raised anew the specter of civil war.

Croatia's delegation walked out of a meeting with regional leaders trying to smooth out acute differences over Yugoslavia's future.

Controversy over army meddling in politics has mounted after the military on Wednesday ordered the arrest.

It came within 24 hours of Croatian Defense Minister Martin Spigelj and was for allegedly plotting an armed uprising against Yugoslavia.

Separatist-minded Croatia, which last week narrowly averted clashes with the army, refused to carry out the order.

Rush-hour crash leaves 3 injured

Truck, car collide at intersection

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

Three K-State students were hospitalized after a rush-hour car accident at 11th Street and Bluemont Avenue.

The collision occurred when Jocelyn Decker, junior in pre-physical therapy, turned left from Bluemont Avenue onto 11th Street in her black Dodge Shadow and collided with a tan Mazda pickup truck driven by Julie Kroenlein, junior in journalism and mass communications.

Because the passenger side of Decker's car was struck almost head-on, officials could not open the door. The right side of Kroenlein's pickup truck was also damaged as a result of the accident.

Jamie Floyd, sophomore in political science, was a passenger in the car with Decker.

Riley County police officers assisted the emergency medical technicians in removing the accident victims from their vehicles by stretchers.

All three students were taken by ambulance to Irwin Army Community Hospital.

Nursing supervisors at the hospital refused to comment on the physical status of the three students.

Emergency personnel pull Jocelyn Decker, junior in pre-physical therapy, from her car after a collision with another vehicle at Bluemont Avenue and 11th Street Thursday. Three people were injured.

Gorbachev asked to suspend plans

MOSCOW (AP) — The Russian legislature voted Thursday to ask President Mikhail Gorbachev to suspend plans to mount joint army and police patrols in Soviet cities as early as Friday.

The legislature called the plan unconstitutional and potentially destabilizing.

The effect of the vote was impossible to determine in the increasingly tense Soviet political atmosphere, but it reflected anxiety among Russia's federation president and other reformers that hard-liners were preparing to take control.

"Who knows what might happen in the next 24-hours?" federation president Boris Yeltsin said during debate on the resolution. The Russian legislature, on a 130-13 vote, asked Gorbachev to suspend plans for the patrols while the issue was reviewed by the national Constitutional Surveillance Committee and considered by the elected governments of the 15 Soviet republics.

Bush declares national prayer day

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush on Thursday asked all Americans to join in a national day of prayer for peace Sunday.

Bush also signed legislation giving U.S. servicemen and women fighting the Persian Gulf War a special tax break and an extension on filing their returns. The new law allows the troops to get interest on tax refunds based on their time of service in the war.

The State Department said that 70 acts of terrorism have been carried out worldwide against the United States and its allies since the war began, some of them by groups alleged to have sympathies with the Iraqi cause.

Department spokeswoman Margaret Tutwiler said that the leanings of all the terrorists were not known, but the government was not trying to devalue the seriousness of Saddam Hussein's claim to strike terrorism around the world.

Finney's tax plan stuck in House

TOPEKA (AP) — Gov. Joan Finney's plan for financing property tax relief appears to be stuck in the House of Representatives.

Thursday, it was bogged down in three subcommittees of the Taxation Committee that mulled over tax legislation.

A subcommittee assigned to look at local governments' taxing powers forwarded a list of ideas to the full committee after its meeting.

The subcommittee's goal is to give cities, counties and school districts more ways to raise money aside from property taxes, and to find ways to limit local governments' spending.

The committee debated a list of possibilities for more than an hour before approving a few measures. Those included allowing local units to increase property taxes on motor vehicles, eliminate some property tax exemptions and increase the household income of those eligible for relief under the homestead property tax program from $15,000 to $20,000.

Superintendent faces misdemeanor

MOUND CITY (AP) — The superintendent of schools was charged Thursday with misdemeanor assault and battery for allegedly shaking the mother of a student.

The charge was filed against Gary Wimmer, superintendent of the Jayhawk-Linn School District, following a complaint by Holly Dawson of Mound City, according to Linn County attorney Robert Young.

Dawson said that Wimmer grabbed her arm and shook her during an argument in the office of high school principal Dwayne Osborne.

Dawson said she and another woman went to see Osborne to get some information on district policies concerning high school and junior high school athletic funds, junior high student council and the election of junior high cheerleaders.

Dawson said she and the other woman, Merlene New, have been concerned that senior high athletics are emphasized at the expense of junior high activities.

Osborne refused to give her all the information that she wanted. When she told Osborne she intended to contact an attorney, he went to get Wimmer, Dawson said.

VITA offers tax help free-of-charge

Free help in filling out your tax forms is just a walk away. A large staff of student volunteers have been trained by the Internal Revenue Service to assist any tax payer in filling out their forms.

Bryan Coffey, senior in business administration and volunteer coordinator, said assistance sites will run through midnight, April 15 at nearby campus and community locations.

Each site will have volunteers trained to help foreign students with their special needs, and to assist with more complicated tax forms, such as those for dividend income.

The individual needing help should bring last year's federal and state returns, receipts and bills for deductions, W-2's, any statements showing extra income, and a Social Security card.

Senate appoints new ASK director

In a brief and calm Student Senate meeting Thursday night, Senate unanimously passed a resolution appointing Jake Reisinger as the KSU Associated Students of Kansas campus director.

"My No. 1 goal is visibility on campus. I feel that in the past that's been an area where ASK has been lacking because it's a much more prominent organization on other campuses," Reisinger said. "They take much more to heart what ASK can do for their school."

As the ASK campus director, Reisinger said he will try to place articles in the K-State Collegian informing students and faculty on the nature of ASK as well as updating them on the organization's activities.

In other business Derek Nelson, Senate Operations committee chairman, moved a resolution in support of a smoke-free K-State Union. Nelson said the Union Governing Board had been considering the proposal to restrict smoking from all areas of the building but has since tabled the issue until they get a response from Student Senate.

When asked if there has been a response from smokers toward the proposal, Nelson said there has been opposition to it.

"Slowly UGB has toned down the area that smokers are allowed, and now I believe they are concentrated in one area on the first floor — and it has been somewhat controversial," he said.

Proposed bill will support recycling

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Nearly everyone knows about recycling, but many don't recycle because it is too much trouble deciding what products should be saved for recycling.

A hearing next Wednesday on a bill sponsored by Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, would make those decisions much easier to answer.

Senate Bill 46 would require labeling of plastic bottles and containers from manufacturers within the next two years.

The label is an international numerical code, numbers one through eight, which relate to contents of recyclability of various types of plastics.

Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's Recycling, formerly Can-Man, said the proposed bill would encourage recycling.

"It would save time and money because people can throw away and sort what can't be recycled first and then I don't have to," he said.

Around 20 other states already have similar bills, so many plastic bottles coming in are already labeled, Wilson said.

"This bill is definitely necessary though because there are still some bottles that come in here that aren't," he said.

Wilson said the cost for manufacturers to label the bottles would be a minimal, one-time expense.

"All they'd have to do is change the die-cast," he said. "It's no extra trouble, I used to do that myself when I worked for a manufacturing company."

Jan Garton, co-president of the Northern Flint Hills Audubon Society, said this bill would be a real benefit to both consumers and recyclers.

"There are some important people backing this bill, so it should pass handily," she said. "Since other states already require labeling, the industry has had to make some necessary changes anyway."

Garton said this bill came up last year but died because people weren't informed enough to know if its implementation would be a big problem.

"The other states have pretty much worked out the kinks for us so there shouldn't be any controversy," he said.

Oleen, the primary sponsor for this bill, said she has been working on it with the waste reduction and recycling commission since last summer.

"You must do your homework before you can expect results," she said. "I built a coalition to endorse and speak on this issue to make sure it will pass."

Oleen said she has asked several K-State experts to testify in support of the bill. Their testimony will begin at 8 a.m. Feb. 6 in room 423 south of the Statehouse.

"I encourage anyone who has been voluntarily recycling to come out and testify on the issue," Oleen said.

"The recyclable bottles can be pulled out before they ever get to the landfill, so it won't fill up as quickly," she said.

Jonathan Morris, junior in mathematics and president of Students Acting for a Vulnerable Environment, said the bill would be a step in the right direction because it would make recycling more convenient and systematic. But other issues remain to be addressed.

"We need to work on reducing consumption and encouraging the purchase of paper and reusable products," he said. "We need more legislation on the environmental issues."

Mozart's death commemorated

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

The 200th anniversary of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's death will be commemorated by three musical performances in McCain Auditorium this semester. "An Evening of Mozart's Wind Music," is at 8 p.m. tonight and features 13 musicians from places such as Boston, New York, Brazil and Korea.

The group of musicians, assembled by member Daniel McKelway, is performing the works together just two times. The first performance was at Middlebury College in Vermont. The McCain performance will be the second and last performance given by the group.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said it was exciting to have these performers come to K-State because it will be a twice-in-a-lifetime gathering of these people.

The performers have studied or are studying at a variety of well-known institutions including the Eastman School of Music, the New England Conservatory and the Juilliard School of Music, Martin said.

Besides performing together, they also play or have played with other groups such as the Montreal Symphony, the Boston Philharmonic, the American Symphony and the American-Soviet Youth Orchestra.

"The group will be performing cool, easy-listening music," Martin said.

One arrangement they will perform is a version of Mozart's "Overture to the Marriage of Figaro."

Karen Lerps, graduate student in music, said this piece was transcribed by Johann Wendt for wind instruments.

The overture is a comedy written for the play "Le mariage de Figaro," written by Pierre Beaumarchais, Lerps said.

"Although lighthearted in nature, this opera instills a sense of excitement and anticipation in the audience," she said.

Other pieces the group will perform include "Serenade No. 11 in E-Flat for Winds" and "Gran Partita," which Lerps said were written more as entertainment.

Although Mozart's music may often be thought of by some as complicated and boring, Lerps said this program is accessible to anyone.

"You do not have to be a music major to enjoy this performance. I believe the young, old and even hard rockers would enjoy it," she said.

Admission costs are $7.50 for students, $13 for senior citizens and $15 for the general public.

Telefund campaign needs student help

MIKE VENSO
Collegian Reporter

The telephone lines have all been laid with care in hopes that donations would soon be there. No, this isn't a belated Christmas fairy tale. It's time once again for Telefund.

Volunteer students and faculty members will begin the 1991 KSU Foundation Telefund campaign Sunday evening.

The month-long fund-raising campaign will utilize nearly 1,200 callers contacting about 50,000 alumni from across the country. "Telefund is the primary reason K-State leads the Big Eight in percentage of alumni supporting their university," said Art Loub, Foundation president.

The 1990 Telefund campaign raised $674,355 from 19,523 alumni.

Telefund started in 1980 and has generated gifts worth over $4 million. Since 1985, the amount of Telefund dollars pledged has doubled.

The gifts collected are managed by the Foundation and are returned to the appropriate colleges to help provide scholarships and educational program support. John Dollar, assistant dean of the College of Engineering said, "We don't send the dean to Florida. The money raised comes directly back into student activities. The bulk of it goes into the engineering scholarship program," Dollar said.

Telefund is dependent on support from students and faculty from all colleges. Each college has about 30 callers each night and the length of time for calling depends on the size of the college.

Telefund director Beth Menelle said, "Arts and Sciences calls for nine nights, whereas a much smaller college like Architecture and Design can reach their alumni in two nights."

Dollar, who has been organizing callers to help with this year's drive said, "The idea is to keep the phone hot and don't let it cool off. Always keep someone on the phone."

Students interested in helping with Telefund can contact their college's Telefund coordinator to get signed up.

Telefund calling sessions are from 6-10 p.m. Sunday through Thursday during February.

Aircraft lost in gulf war

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Pentagon sources said Thursday that another U.S. military aircraft had been lost in the Persian Gulf War.

The aircraft crew of 14 was reported downed behind Iraqi lines, Pentagon sources said.

After briefings from Pentagon officials, members of Congress said that the aircraft was a modified version of the C-130 equipped with small cannons and machine guns.

The aircraft went down over Kuwait, the lawmakers said. A Pentagon source, speaking on the condition of anonymity, would not say whether the plane was downed over Iraq or Kuwait.

The lawmakers said the plane, capable of flying at low altitudes and destroying bunkers and gasoline trucks with heavy firepower, was part of a mission under Special Operations forces.

The plane normally carries a crew of five officers and nine enlisted personnel.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN EDITORIAL

K-State's band deserves hearty thank you

With all the Persian Gulf hoopla we are weathering, I refuse to engage in another opinion-laden war editorial — that horse has already been beaten silly. Besides, there is an issue worthy of consideration here on the home front. There are people who need our immediate support almost as badly as the troops. I'm talking about the Pride of Wildcatland. Still no clue? How about our very own Kansas State University Marching and Basketball Pep Band. Or, as I like to refer to them, the Band.

Don't let the fancy name fool you. The men and women behind the woodwinds, percussion and brass are merely college students like everybody else, almost. It takes a special breed of person to fill a pair of band shoes: resilient, patient, intense, dedicated, musically talented and above all, strange.

So strange are they, in fact, that those incapable of empathy have labeled such perceived social aberrations as "band geeks," a term as old as humankind itself. I offer that those who find themselves categorized this way should wear it as a badge of honor. It takes a lot of work to be a performing musician and entertainer. But it takes still more to exert yourself time after time in front of large crowds of insensitive college students who don't give a damn about something that you have knocked yourself out preparing for their own benefit.

How am I in a position to know this? Put simply, I've been there. Yes, it may or may not be difficult to ascertain from my picture that I am a "band geek" alumnus. From pre-junior high days through high school, I donned the appropriate hometown colors and put a horn to my lips in order to support my teams as best I could. And during the two previous years of my collegiate experience, I colored my body purple and white, took the field and learned to play "Wildcat Victory" in my sleep. I even stomached the hard plastic marching clogs that are about as comfortable as those slip-covered dress shoes you receive with your high school prom tux.

With all this in mind, why would anybody ever want to put themselves through such hell? Who would ever spend over two hours a day, five days a week, practicing for a class that will amount to only one hour worth of academic credit? Why would somebody want to spend about half of his or her fall semester Saturdays standing on some yard line at 8:30 in the morning knowing full well that the day won't end until about 6 p.m.? Good questions all.

Questions like these become even more vexing when, among many other injustices, it's pointed out that very few participants receive any sort of scholarship sustenance, as the K-State music department is not known for its boundless wealth. In fact, only after much time, sweat, and participation from both faculty, staff and students (not to mention monumental amounts of groveling) did the marching band receive new crisp white uniforms. Unfortunately, a few of our very own intoxicated 'Cats fans were kind enough to throw a few nice large colas on some band members. (Way to go, ICAT.)

Roblin Meeks

Although our band may not have the cash flow of other programs, say the University of Kansas for example, we do have some great people running the show. Stan Finck, the director of bands, really knows how to (literally) drag the best possible performance out of everyone (even the clarinets). His unquenchable desire for perfection has kept more than one squad on the field until 5:45 p.m. during a downpour, and has also succeeded in making the Pride of Wildcatland estimable in the eyes of her contemporaries, say KU for example.

Likewise, Ben Rohrer is deserving of some University-wide recognition for his dedication to the band and the music department in general. If you don't believe me, just take in at least one of his jazz band's performances, and especially the Concert Jazz Ensemble he directs. Be prepared to be amazed.

Although the drum majors deserve notice as well, I think the most credit is due to those in the trenches, the common everyday musicians are the people who continue to show up even after they've been told that their high mark-times are too low, their playing ranks up there with that of fifth graders, and they only need to do it one more time (yeah right). To you, I take off my beret in the utmost respect.

Now, returning to my former question, why do they do it? Well, it may be because they share a common love of music, or maybe it's just a lot of fun for a whole bunch of people, or perhaps it's because strange people are by some freak of nature brought together. Whatever the case may be, to get an expert's opinion, you might want to ask either Steve Warren, Kenny Roe, Darrin Baldwin or various other late-timers. They've been around long enough to get some idea what it's all about.

As for my band career, the amount of time that I could give to the band at K-State grievously evaporated as my college years progressed. I do miss it, however. It was weird to catch Tuesday's K-State-KU basketball rivalry from the stands this year. I sat in my section, striving to make out old friends from across Bramlage and catch every note I could. It seems like only a few days ago that I was polishing my baritone and avidly waiting to play until my face hurt. Those were the days.

What I'm asking is that when you are watching a 'Cats game, be it football or basketball, try to remember that tunes like "Wabash Cannonball" or "Eat 'Em Up" don't come from a CD player. They come from real live instruments played by real live people who care enough to show up and play game in and game out. So if you can, stop looking at the cheerleaders for a second and take a moment to listen to a song or two. It won't kill you and you might even find some small sense of enjoyment (heaven forbid!).

Finally, I know that "band geeks" repeatedly are told, "Keep up the good work." Personally, I want to reiterate that and add a big "THANK YOU" as well. You more than deserve it. I just hope others will soon realize what you do for K-State. In the meantime, you'll always have a huge fan in me as long as I'm around. "I Can't Stop Loving You."

Ribbon should grace gate

Almost all the troops from Fort Riley have been deployed to the deserts of Saudi Arabia.

Just as fast as the troops left, yellow ribbons popped up everywhere around town.

Well, nearly everywhere.

Just about the only exception is the Higinbotham Gate on the southeast corner of campus.

Student senators and campus employees hoped to hang ribbons at the gate, but Faculty Senate killed the motion citing the lack of a clear meaning behind the ribbons.

How ironic it is that a University, who's mission is to educate, would pass over the opportunity to take a stand and educate a community about its decision.

The University should reconsider its position and commit their support to all Americans serving their country and hope that they return home safely.

That is the accepted meaning and the historical definition of the yellow ribbons. The same definition used when the city of Manhattan decided to decorate light poles with the ribbons. The same definition used to support the display of ribbons in Triangle Park in Aggieville, just a few feet away from the University entrance in question.

The decision by the University is quite hypocritical.

The athletic department has already sent a message of American troop support with its display of yellow ribbons hanging from the Bramlage Coliseum scoreboard and yellow ribbons on the uniforms of the cheerleaders and yell leaders.

The basketball teams as well have lent their support by wearing American flags on their uniforms and the coaches wearing yellow ribbons as they instruct from the sidelines.

Last Tuesday, ESPN televised the K-State-KU game across the nation and undoubtedly showed the ribbons and flags. The entire country now knows that K-State supports the troops, but the people of the K-State and Manhattan community do not.

Put a ribbon on the gate and show some pride in our country.

Letters

Activist protests

Editor,

I am the person who penned and proudly displayed the sign bearing the words "Take peace by storm — support Bush and our troops," mentioned derisively by Scott Miller in his letter to the editor on Jan. 28. I would like to remind Mr. Miller that degrading and insulting those with whom you disagree is both childish and ineffectual. Further, I find it impudent of him to assume he knows my views on other issues.

Mr. Miller raises several good, solid points on American foreign policy, and I would be willing to discuss these. For now, however, I will be content to re-express my support for Operation Desert Storm and those who serve.

Letter supportive

Editor,

As an international student, I feel compelled to reply to the implication in Thursday's Collegian that the Dean of Student Life Office attempted to stifle international students' freedom of expression by the letter of encouragement that went out from that office to international students. To me, the letter was part of a continuous effort of the Office of Student Life and the International Student Center to support me and other international students at times when support is hard to find.

Because of events in the past few months, many of us feel insecure and worried about friends and families who are often hard, if not impossible, to contact. It is a great comfort to know there are people who care about us, who understand our problems and who try to help in any way they can. Their advice to keep a low profile was not an attempt to keep international students from expressing their views, rather it came from a concern about us.

Several students have been interrogated by government agencies and even threatened and harassed by members of this community after participating in public events or talking to the press. Since we come from different countries with different systems, some of us were not aware that we are not obligated to talk to the anyone if we do not wish to do so, and the letter cleared this point.

In the four years that I have been at K-State, the friendly people at the Dean of Student Life Office and the International Student Center have given me nothing but heartfelt support. There are many students who join me in thanking them for providing the care and comfort of a family, especially in times like these.

Cosima Dabbas

Soldier responds

Editor,

I am an active-duty soldier stationed at Fort Riley. At the present time, my unit is not part of Operation Desert Storm. If the word came down, I would willingly join my brothers and sisters in arms. As a professional soldier, I have taken a solemn oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States, and to bear true faith and allegiance to the same. This oath I have taken four times in the last ten years.

So it is with great disgust that I have read in the Collegian, that citizens who oppose Desert Storm are being threatened and intimidated by so called "supporters" of Desert Storm. This type of thuggery would be appropriate in Iraq or the Soviet Union but not in the United States, not in a democracy. I probably have some strong differences with Kale Baldock and Wendy Herdman, but I support their constitutional right to express their opinions. I would be disloyal to my oath as an American soldier if I did not.

Those who persecute citizens who oppose the current war are cowards. They aren't signing up to join the military. Their anti-democratic actions dishonor those of us who wear the soldier's uniform and defend our constitutional government during these critical times.

It would be idealistic to think that all Americans will fall in line and support the war with Iraq. All that we, the American soldiers, ask is that you respect our sacrifice and our struggle. We will not be aided in our fight by bullying anti-war activists. We are not fighting this war to limit freedom, rather we seek to extend it. Let all citizens respect one another and honor our constitution.

James Hicks
staff sergeant, Fort Riley

Kuwaiti dodges

Editor,

It's amazing how many opinions seem to have popped up in recent months. I have heard everyone from die-hard military men to potential draft dodgers. Maybe if we add everyone's two cents worth, we could finance this war. Nevertheless, just to get everyone more riled up, I'd like to pose a question raised in Jane Mayer's article in the Wall Street Journal. Just who are our brothers, fathers, wives and friends risking their lives for over there?

The mentioned article depicts a Kuwaiti "disco problem" of "fashionably dressed Kuwaiti youths ... celebrating news of war ... ordering drinks, nibbling hors d'oeuvres and gyrating to American pop hits." Doesn't that get your goat?

And for those afraid of the draft, you're not alone. Eighteen-year-old Kuwaiti Ashrad el Qattan plans to study medicine in Egypt, because Kuwait has student draft deferments. Of course, I am sure the boy is baffled after fleeing Kuwait last summer in his Mercedes to a $3000-a-month apartment in Cairo.

He said, "I thought about entering the Army, but I would rather study. The troops over there can surely handle it."

Our loved ones are not fighting for a country; they're fighting for a "country club."

So I hope the United States is in this war for the principles for which it stands. Because if we are just assisting Kuwait, send M.C. Hammer to teach them a dance from this decade. And remember fellow Americans, "death before disco."

A.J. Stecklein

Lady Cats look to maintain winning ways

Mizzou still searching for 1st conference win

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

"In that game, I was just happy to be in the hunt," Coach Susan Yow said following the Lady Cats' 74-73 overtime victory at KU Wednesday.

But with a 5-2 record and a share of the Big Eight Conference lead, Yow said she wants more than just to be in the hunt.

The Lady Cats can move one step closer to a Big Eight title with a victory over the Missouri Tigers at 6 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

In taking on a squad like Missouri, which has yet to record a conference win, the Lady Cats could be tempted to look down the road to crucial matchups with Oklahoma State and Nebraska.

But with the conference lead at stake, Yow warns that the Lady Cats cannot afford to be overconfident about Saturday's contest.

"We still have to go out and play well to win, no matter who we're playing," Yow said. "We've worked too hard to let ourselves overlook someone. We need to keep focusing and just look at one game at a time."

Yow said the team is aware of its position in the standings, and at 12-6 on the year with a win over No. 23-ranked Oklahoma State earlier this season, the possibility of making a dent in the national polls.

"I can't say those things don't go through your mind. But allowing yourself to think about things like that too much will take energy away from what you need to do," Yow said. "I think we realize our position and think we're aware of the danger of looking ahead. We're just trying to look at one game at a time to prevent a letdown."

A win over Missouri earlier this season helped the Lady Cats reach the top of the Big Eight. After hanging close through the first half, the Lady Cats held the Tigers scoreless for nearly seven minutes and Nadira Hazim broke the game open with 15 points in the second half. The 68-53 win marked the Lady Cats' first in Columbia in eight years.

"We played one of our best games of the season there," Yow said. "It was one of those games where things just sort of came together. We felt like we were really in synch some of the night."

Missouri, the defending regular-season conference champion, dropped to 0-7 with a loss to Nebraska on Wednesday and is looking desperately to get on a winning track, Yow said.

"They're a good team that's really trying to find itself right now," Yow said. "I think they'll come here just trying to execute a little better. They'll really be looking for something positive to hold onto."

Seniors Hazim and Diana Miller will continue their assault on the Lady Cat and Big Eight scoring charts against the Tigers. With just eight points, Miller could move into second place on the K-State scoring charts, while Hazim needs just four points to become the fourth player in school history to crack the 1,500-point barrier.

Lady Cat Coach Susan Yow

Nadira Hazim, grabbing a rebound in the overtime win against Oklahoma State, has scored 20-plus points in six straight games.

Fade in '90 possible plus

Coach Susan Yow's Lady Cats will show the world during the final month of the regular season if a bed of nails is better than a fluffy, feathered one.

That is, if they haven't already done it.

Wednesday's 74-73 overtime thriller over Kansas had to start cardiac arrest in those Lady Cat fans who didn't suffer it after last weekend's 78-72 overtime win against defending Big Eight Conference Tournament champion Oklahoma State.

K-State is getting its money's worth out of anti-perspirants, as five of the seven league games have been decided by less than 10 points, including three Lady Cat wins.

Ah, the things of which great seasons are made — close victories, clutch performances and a little luck.

Things aren't coming easy for K-State this year, and it might be a blessing. Only time will tell. Currently, the Lady Cats are in a three-way tie for the league's top spot with Oklahoma State and Nebraska at 5-2. Kansas and Iowa State are right on their tails at 4-3.

Relaxing is the last thing anybody expects Yow's group to do right now. History is a pretty good teacher, and K-State doesn't have to look too far into its past to find a valuable lesson. Through the same number of conference games last season, the Lady Cats were looking down at the rest of the conference with a 7-0 mark.

But K-State's life on Easy Street found some potholes after that. During the second half of the Big Eight season, the Lady Cats dipped to 3-4, didn't win a game by more than four points, and dropped the final two to finish as a bridesmaid to Missouri in the league race.

It carried over to the postseason tournament championship game in Salina, when the Cowgirls rallied to prevent K-State from qualifying for the NCAA Tournament.

Thanks to a large group of underclassmen on last year's team, the vow not to let the same thing happen again can be made nine times.

Many coaches and players aren't keen on being the top dog during the course of a season because of the effects it has on teams below them. Last year, the rest of the Big Eight spent the month of February trying to take the stuffing out of K-State's cushion.

Not that any of the Lady Cats need to be reminded, but it worked.

This year, a cushion doesn't exist for any team. Instead of being shot at by everyone, K-State can return some of its own fire. Having five teams within a game of the lead this late in the season is an example of parity that is difficult to duplicate anywhere in the country.

Any lapse, whether it be one or two games, could kill a team's chances for winning the league title.

If K-State has one ace up its sleeve, it is senior guard Nadira Hazim. She is averaging 23.3 points per game in league play, and fired in 56 points in the last two wins.

Leadership may be an overestimated quality at times, but when you consider the experience gained by the Lady Cats last season, a league title appears to be there for the taking.

But it's probably resting on the other side of a bed of nails.

Klinger says no to entry

By the Associated Press

David Klingler is staying and Todd Marinovich isn't saying.

Klingler, Houston's record-setting quarterback, said Thursday that he will return for his senior season rather than enter the NFL draft.

Marinovich, Southern Cal's troubled quarterback, also was expected to announce his decision on Thursday. But there was no official word on whether he will skip his final two years of eligibility or go pro.

Underclassmen have until Friday to notify the NFL of their intention to enter the April draft. So far, 22 have applied. Last year, 38 players left school early to enter the draft.

Track squads to compete at Nebraska triangular

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

The K-State men's and women's track teams travel to Lincoln Saturday for the Nebraska Triangular.

The meet will not be scored, therefore the emphasis will be put on individual performances rather than being focused on a team concept, said Coach John Capriotti.

"This meet, we're running more people in their own events," he said.

Often, for training purposes, the athletes don't compete in their strongest events in the early-season meets, he said.

The triangular will be used to evaluate where the athletes are at this point. This, in turn, will help determine where the athlete needs to be in order to peak at the end of the season.

Capriotti said although 10 percent to 15 percent of both teams are not competing due to sickness and injuries, he is looking for better performances from those who are competing.

"Those competing need to step-up their times and distances," he said. "We're ready for better performances."

Capriotti said it is important to keep the athletes who are sick or injured out of the meet to ensure they are healthy soon.

If the athletes are going to get sick or injured, it is better for it to happen now, in the early part of the season, rather than later, he said.

"We want to get everybody healthy, especially with the Big Eight Championships coming up in less than a month," he said.

Teams from Washington and Nebraska are also competing on the men's side, and Rice and Nebraska will compete on the women's side.

The meet will be held at Bob Devaney Sports Center. Field events will begin at 11 a.m. and running events at noon.

Tennis team to open season

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Injuries and inexperience will add to the challenge of the tennis team's spring season opener at Topeka this weekend.

Duals with Illinois today and Arkansas Saturday will provide the first regular season action several members of the team have seen.

Making matters even more delicate for Coach Steve Bietau, two members of the team will be sidelined by injuries, forcing others into unfamiliar slots in the lineup.

"Our injury situation is improving, but we can't really tell how much yet, or how soon some of us will be ready to get back on the court," Bietau said. "That's our No. 1 area of concern because we don't have anything set yet and are having to play people in places where they don't have experience."

Angie Gover, who filled the No. 4 position in the fall, will be held out of singles competition to nurse a sore shoulder and foot, but may be ready to play doubles. Newcomer Rosemary Hunter will be out of competition for at least another week due to a knee injury, Bietau said.

"We're hoping that they'll be ready soon, but it's a long season, and the Big Eight season is what's really important to us," Bietau said. "We want to have everyone in top shape at that point without risking losing anyone by bringing them back too soon."

This weekend's matchups will give the team a taste of what is in store for the rest of the spring. The schedule, highlighted by seven Top 25 teams nationally, is by far the toughest in school history, Bietau said.

"Those are both very solid teams," Bietau said of this weekend's challengers. "It will be our first experience against Illinois, and they look like they will be very competitive. Arkansas, of course, we play every year, and year in and year out, they are very tough."

Three months without a meet and the long semester break produced a lot of uncertainties for the squad, but Bietau said the break was a productive one.

"In terms of our practice, it seems like we've made some real progress since fall," Bietau said. "You always look forward to your first meet to get a gauge of what you did over break."

"I think the break had a positive effect on us. It's good to take a break from the court and get rested. The team did a good job of staying in shape over the break."

Guard Jeff Wires, shown making a diving pass during the road win at Wichita State earlier this season, will lead the 'Cats into battle Saturday against Colorado in Bramlage Coliseum.

Pair with nasty losing streaks to battle in Bramlage Saturday

Colorado's Big 8 road futility continuing in 1991

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Buzzards are circling over K-State. So are Buffaloes.

Apparently, the blood is fresh enough that some forecasters believe Colorado's 54-game Big Eight Conference losing streak on the road may end this weekend in Bramlage Coliseum.

But on the flip side...

"It's a game that if we win, we may have a chance to turn our season around," Wildcat guard Jean Derouillere said.

Either way, one team will get over a hump in Saturday's 3:05 p.m. contest. The starting time is different than what was printed on game tickets because of TV scheduling.

The importance of Saturday's game hasn't gone unnoticed by anybody on K-State's bench.

"It's a game that we need to come out swinging," K-State coach Dana Altman said.

A few punches during the middle and end won't hurt the 'Cats, either. K-State's biggest problem in Big Eight games has been finding the perfect 40 minutes.

The result is an 0-5 start, the 'Cats' worst since the conference went to eight teams in 1958.

Altman

Derouillere

"We need someone to take a hold of things when things are going sideways on the court," Altman said. "Right now, we're just not getting that."

In Tuesday's 78-69 loss to Kansas, the wheels came off at the beginning of the second half, when the Jayhawks went on a 22-6 run. Derouillere said K-State's lack of defensive intensity at the end of the floor in front of KU's bench started the swoon.

"We'll have to learn to play without our coaches right in front of us," Derouillere said. "When we're away from them, they're not yelling at us and letting us know we're out of position."

"I guess we'll have to count on ourselves more and start talking."

Derouillere's theory will be put to a strong test Saturday. The Buffaloes, under first-year Coach Joe Harrington, feature two of the league's top offensive threats in seniors Stevie Wise and Shaun Vandiver.

When Harrington came to Colorado from Long Beach State, he promised the Buffs would run and score a lot. Wise and Vandiver — CU's version of Mr. Outside and Mr. Inside — have flourished, averaging 21.5 and 20.9 points per game, respectively.

"Next to (Missouri's) Anthony) Peeler and Doug Smith, I would say Wise and Vandiver are the second best one-two punch in the league," Altman said.

Colorado's up-tempo style has produced 88.1 points per game, its highest-scoring team in school history. The increased output has vaulted the Buffaloes to a 12-6 record.

Still, numbers have not been kind to Colorado in its basketball history. The Buffs have been the league's doormat for nine of the last 13 seasons, including a current string of five years.

Colorado's last Big Eight road win came Feb. 10, 1983, a 75-74 win at Kansas. The Buffaloes have lost 41 out of 44 games in Manhattan.

American Voices

Students, faculty march for peace in time of war

Lyman Baker, instructor in English, ties a banner on the bus the morning of Jan. 25. The bus was bound for a protest the following day in Washington, D.C.

A protester looks on as speakers deliver messages in the Mall before marching in Washington, D.C.

War-time dissent has a long history in the United States, dating back to at least the late 1840s.

During the Mexican-American War, Rep. Abraham Lincoln of Illinois questioned President James Polk's contention that the war began with a Mexican assault on American soil. The concept of civil disobedience was born after Henry David Thoreau spent the night in a Massachusetts jail.

Since then, many of America's wars have been widely protested, including the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, World War I and, of course, Vietnam.

In what was perhaps the largest peace demonstration since the Vietnam War, 200,000 people marched Jan. 26 in Washington, D.C. to protest the war with Iraq.

Among those thousands were 17 students and two faculty members from K-State. Each paid $100 for a 52-hour round-trip bus ride.

During the trip, they slept on the bus, went without access to showers or bathtubs, ate meals in fast-food restaurants and changed clothes in service station restrooms or the small restroom in the back of the bus.

K-Staters shared the 41-seat bus with a Kansas City-area peace group, which included members of a musicians coalition for peace and justice.

As music played, marchers discussed their classes, their lives and, given the nature of the trip, their politics. They also discussed the war.

Three of the K-State students on the bus said they went because the war personally affected them and at earlier points in their lives they had questioned the stated motives of U.S. policies in other areas.

For Laura Vetter, sophomore in philosophy/pre-law and a single mother, the Jan. 26 march was a moment to return home to the place she grew up. Vetter said she first marched in a protest in Washington, D.C., when she was a high-school student during the Vietnam War.

"But during Vietnam they took people away kicking and screaming in the draft. When you're 18 years old, you think you're going to live forever, but when you start seeing your own classmates being sent off to war and they don't come back, it brings your own mortality right to the fore. And then you get scared and try to do anything you can to stop such an atrocity," Vetter said.

"I have that sort of same feeling now, only I'm a generation older."

Vetter said she spent a restless night before deciding to go on the Washington trip.

"Washington, D.C., and Alexandria, (Va.) is going back home," she said. "The last time I saw the four friends I sent off to Vietnam was the last time I was in Alexandria and went to the Vietnam War Memorial — because none of them came back and that's the only way I can visit them anymore."

Jonathan Morris, junior in mathematics and physical sciences and a former student body president candidate, said he went from being a Kansas conservative Republican to a liberal Democrat because of what he read about U.S. policies in Central America.

Through reading and taking a course about Central America, Morris said he saw the role the U.S. played in continual suppression of some of the poor in the area. In an effort to maintain U.S. interests there, he said, the United States interfered with some of the revolutionary movements that were positive for the area.

"I think it was basically a fear in our country that we would lose some of our stability there. I think that same ideology kind of carries over into the Middle East," he said.

"I think we've been wanting to do this for some time in some capacity ... to protect our own interests there. The Iraqi invasion of Kuwait just presented itself at an opportune time for the U.S. to intervene, to use military force to create a sense of control," Morris said.

Marcella Wilson, sophomore in political science, said she took the trip in part because of an uncle who deployed to Saudi Arabia from Fort Riley on the Saturday before the war started.

"I understand why he is doing what he is doing. I might not agree with it, but I am very proud of what he is doing," Wilson said.

"I do feel that it is politically and economically wrong to be in this conflict. More than that, I realize the reason I feel I need to speak out is because I know firsthand exactly what it is these men and women in Saudi Arabia are giving up. I feel that even though my uncle might not agree with what I am doing, it is my obligation to him — because of what he is doing — to do what I can to bring him and the other troops home," she said.

Vetter said she also went to Washington because her 22-year-old son told her if he is drafted, he will fight in the Persian Gulf.

"If my son wants to go and fight the war, then I'm going to pat him on the back and wish him well and just pray till he gets home. But I believe that he doesn't have the right to ask me to want him to go — or anyone else for that matter. I love life too much," she said.

Wilson said she did not believe the protest would end the war, but it might cause people to re-examine

Rockin' with Dokken

LORI STAUFFER
Staff Reporter

The glamorous life of playing in a rock band isn't everything it's cracked up to be. Long hours on the road cramped on a tour bus with the same people day after day, not knowing what day it is can take its toll on any person — especially someone who has to do it for a living.

"It is frustrating, I'll tell you that," said Peter Baltes, bass player for Don Dokken, in a phone interview Tuesday. "In the hotel rooms, which are really not that pleasant as well, at least you have some time for yourself. You want to make phone calls. You want to relax. You just want to see nobody for awhile."

Among those, Baltes spends time on the phone with his wife and 8-month-old son who live in Philadelphia.

"It's very difficult. It makes you think," he said. "You want to have them with you all the time but it's not real life for a family to be on the road. The only reason it works is because my wife believes in me so much. You have to go because that's what you're best at."

"Right now this is the best I can do for my son," Baltes said. "When he gets a little older, I really want to be home."

"It's Don's voice. No matter what you do, it will always end up with the Dokken sound because of his voice."

Also, the guitars and a lot of stuff was written by Don or with him," Baltes said.

Dokken, who met Baltes while producing Dokken's first album in 1982, persuaded him to play on the album and then actually join the band.

Baltes said he got to know the other members of the band while they lived together on Dokken's estate.

"It was funny. Basically, we were hanging out together everyday. It was a good idea because it is very important to find out how each person is. We learned a little bit about everybody during this time. It was very funny. There are certainly a bunch of characters here," Baltes said.

"John (Norum) never does dishes. He just doesn't. John just believes a guitar player doesn't do dishes," he said. "Billy (White) just sits there and meditates. Mikkey (Dee) has closets of cologne, anything to put on your body to smell good."

Baltes said performing with the group on stage makes up for all the hours on the road and time he has to spend away from his family.

"There is a certain thing between you and the audience. It's like a big high," he said. "You get on stage and people say, 'Wow!' There is nothing bigger than that."

Don Dokken will open for Poison tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

Acker leads agency

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Less than a week into his new post as USDA's Administrator of Foreign Agricultural Service, former K-State president Duane Acker was busy outlining his agenda.

"We have a real big job to do," he said. "Over the last six months the U.S. has lost market share in most major commodities in most major countries."

Acker was appointed to his new post Jan. 24 by U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Clayton Yeutter. Yeutter said Acker has shown superb performance at the helm of USDA's Office for International Cooperation and Development, a position he will retain in addition to his new duties.

The FAS is the lead agency within USDA for promoting agricultural exports and handling trade policy questions. It also gathers crop and market intelligence data from 100 foreign countries and administers agricultural export assistance programs, Acker said.

Those countries range from Third World nations to the Soviet Union and China, Acker said. Many of them are in desperate need of some diplomatic polishing by the U.S.

"Right now the world market is very competitive," he said. "The U.S. wheat market share loss in China has been especially hard hit. Right now market share is a big issue."

But Acker said the U.S. has two tasks before it in order to remedy the market share woes.

"First, we must increase the U.S. share of global food and agricultural market to compete with Europe," he said. "Secondly, we must do what we can to increase the total global market."

Acker also said Kansas has shown great world leadership in agricultural exports.

Energy, emotion highlight of play

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

The chemistry Tamara Grothaus and Amy Strathman create between their opposing mother-daughter characters is incredible. The realism of the relationship is clearly the highlight of the play and the solution for portraying a theme that could very easily have been lost in gaudy jewelry and southern drawls.

The K-State players' presentation of 'Steel Magnolias' is full of the energy so essential to the very thesis of the play.

Robert Harling's story tells of six southern women and the way they stay strong through hardships by relying on each other. The play is wrought with laughter, tears and every emotion in between.

The story itself is a celebration of the female.

The play encompasses several stages of life all within Truvy's beauty shop. Truvy's is the center for a kind of gossip between the neighborhood ladies, which is really a thin veil for the depth of their concern for one another.

Shelby Eatenton-Latcherie, played by Strathman, is a diabetic in danger from her pregnancy. She declares, "I would rather have 30 minutes of wonderful than a lifetime of nothing special."

And she proceeds to act upon this credence. She shows her strength and her willingness to face danger — rather than lose her life without even living it first.

Grothaus plays M'Lynn Eatenton, Shelby's mother. The depth of her emotion shows in her arguments with Shelby.

Michele Bielser plays Truvy Jones, the beautician in charge. Erin Mansur-Smith plays Annette Dupuy-DeSoto, Truvy's flamboyant assistant. Shirlyn Henry plays Claire Belcher, rich and witty, and Dorinda Hill plays Ouiser Boudreaux.

There are quite a few laughs to be had from 'Steel Magnolias,' and even more wisdom to be seen in their ordinary lives. The cast accurately describes the women we learn from. Yet the realism of the play is not its strong point. Rather, the energy the players create between their characters is clearly the message.

Woman describes El Salvador arrest

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

Jennifer Casolo spoke Thursday night to about 150 people in the K-State Union about her experiences in El Salvador, where she was falsely arrested and charged with hiding and supplying weapons to guerilla forces. The lecture was sponsored by Manhattan Alliance on Central America.

Casolo spoke of her four objectives and hopes for the future of El Salvador — to improve human rights, to improve the economic situation, to build democracy and to stop the war.

"No nation should be secure until all nations are secure — until all people in all nations are secure," she said.

"The bottom line," Casolo said, "is bullets and bombs do not buy peace."

Casolo told of several of her experiences in the country. She had been arrested on Nov. 25, 1989 with the charge of hiding rebels' weapons.

She spent 10 days in a national prison and eight days in a women's prison.

She said when she was taken away, she was filled with love. She said she asked the guards about themselves, and most of them said they wanted to come to America. She was frequently asked how to obtain a visa.

Casolo was released for lack of evidence and sent back to the United States on Dec. 13, 1989 — even though she still wanted to make El Salvador her permanent home.

Since her return to the United States, Casolo has toured the country speaking of her experiences and attempting to make people realize the current situation in El Salvador.

"I urge students before they get their first job in the 'real world' to spend six months working with the poor in a role of empowerment," Casolo said.

"Give hope and be hopeful," she said.

Jennifer Casolo speaks about her experiences in El Salvador.

mony to the sincerity of the objector's beliefs from someone with an opposing view.

Hull said most objectors object to killing, but are willing to serve their country in a different way, such as caring for the wounded.

One audience member talked about the problems he experienced when he filed for conscientious objector status based on religious beliefs.

"It took me two trips to the draft board and to the state appeals board to do it," he said.

He said his objector status during Vietnam, however, hasn't caused him trouble.

troops but not in support of the war." Immigrants may support the war because of the process they go through to become Americans, Vetter said.

"The immigrants that come into our country think they have to fit our mold of what an American citizen is," she said.

"That's a worry to me because when, in fact, you do conform and everyone fits the norm, we become no better than a lot of those countries that we are trying to take over and change. I believe that's what makes America great — the Constitution and the Bill of Rights — the right to be an individual and the right to speak what you mean without fear of anything bad happening to you," Vetter said.

"I went to Washington not to protest the war but to promote peace. And when the troops come home, I will go to Washington or wherever, and I will welcome them with open arms as the heroes that they are," she said. "It takes brave people to go over into a bad situation."

their attitudes toward it.

"If by protesting, we can make one person decide that they don't support Bush's policies — or that they do — the fact that we are making a difference for someone, and making them stop and think either way on the political spectrum, is what's important, and that's why we should be doing this," she said.

In addition to causing reflection on the part of Americans, Morris said one of his goals for the protest was to send the message that the marchers support the troops, but oppose President Bush's decision to go to war.

"I think there is a lot of people out there who certainly are not in support of the concept of war. But because of the troops' involvement there, they feel almost obligated to follow the president's word or the policy of the government because they do not want another Vietnam scenario where you have the troops coming back and being basically rejected by society," he said.

"I think ... demonstrators need to articulate that we are in support of the

Embargo harmful to U.S. farms

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

Cutting off $1 billion grain credits to the Soviet Union may have a greater effect on U.S. farmers than the Soviet people.

The memory of former President Jimmy Carter's grain embargo of the Soviet Union, following the invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, is still fresh in the U.S. grain industry's mind, said Roger Johnson, K-State associate director of the International Grains Program.

The grain embargo was a disaster for the United States, he said. The United States lost an important market, while the Soviet Union bought grain from Canada, Argentina, the European Community and Australia.

Before 1980, the United States had 75 percent of the Soviet's market, but after the embargo, the U.S. share fell to 25 percent.

Johnson said he was impressed grain farmers did not publicly disapprove of a statement from Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan. Three weeks ago, Dole said a suspension of $1 billion grain credits to the Soviet Union might be necessary.

"I believe that unless Gorbachev puts an immediate end to the threats, blackmail and aggression (against the Baltic republics) that the United States should not deal with him in a 'business as usual' manner," Dole said.

In the last 20 years, the Soviet Union has been a major buyer of U.S. grain. As a result, they also have a larger proportion of the world's grain market.

Although the Soviet Union has only 6 percent of the world's population, it has bought an average of 15 percent of the world's grain trade, Johnson said. Sometimes, they have bought more than 25 percent.

As the nation's largest producers, Kansas wheat farmers depend on wheat exports.

"For every six bushels of wheat (grown in the United States), one bushel comes from Kansas," he said. Johnson said there are five major kinds of wheat, which have different milling and baking properties.

Kansas produces 49 percent of the U.S. hard-red-winter wheat. This wheat type is almost exclusively what the Soviet Union buys, Johnson said.

The U.S. administration is preoccupied with the Persian Gulf War, but would like to see greater freedom in the Soviet Union without violence and without chaos, he said.

"Recently, it is very clear their (Soviet Union) economy is falling apart," Johnson said.

AWOL captain contends Americans are being misled

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Smiling, flashing a V-for-peace sign and waving to supporters, Capt. Yolanda Huet-Vaughn, AWOL from the Army, surrendered Saturday to federal marshals in the parking lot of the U.S. District Court House.

Huet-Vaughn, an Army reservist who went AWOL from her Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., medical unit in objection to Operation Desert Shield, now Desert Storm, stepped into a van with heavy wire screens on the windows and was driven away in a convoy of local police and unmarked federal vehicles.

As the van drove out of the parking lot, the small, 39-year-old Kansas City, Kan., family physician, held her thumbs up and continued to wave, smile and make V-signs from behind the screened windows.

She was taken back to Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., following her surrender to face a court-martial.

At a rally at St. Mark's Baptist Church in Kansas City, Mo., prior to her surrender, she criticized President Bush by saying, "You ask me to support the killing of hundreds of thousands. For what — oil? This is insanity."

According to a statement released at the rally, Huet-Vaughn states that "from a medical viewpoint, the public has been misled concerning the catastrophic nature of wounds and injuries that will befall combatants and civilians" in the Persian Gulf War.

At a national rally against the war Jan. 26 in Washington, D.C., Huet-Vaughn said her decision to go AWOL was based in part on the international legal principles laid down at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials of Nazi leaders and generals following World War II.

"Every soldier within the military needs to have a conscience and needs to be a moral person," she said. "Whenever you are given an order, in general, you do whatever you are told. When that order conflicts so strongly with your moral conviction, then you're obligated to act according to your moral convictions. Nuremberg principle actually obligates all soldiers when they feel an order is immoral and illegal to refuse that order."

"And according to the Nuremberg principles, principle 2-B states that devastation of civilian populations, villages, towns, etc., beyond what's mandated by military necessity, that those are considered war crimes," Huet-Vaughn said. "And in this situation, the bombing missions that ... are happening now, are basically targeting civilian populations."

"There's no way you can target Saddam Hussein and his military without targeting the civilians," she said. "And so even as an officer within the military setting, whether I had any other connections with peace groups, etc., I would be obligated to take this stand."

Huet-Vaughn has also said her opposition to service in the war is based on what she described as the inability of the U.S. military to airlift the num-

B-52 goes down; air war continues

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — American "Scud patrol" jets, in a swift counter-strike, pounced on two Iraqi missile launchers Sunday and may have knocked one out. But the Air Force also lost a big one — a B-52 down in the Indian Ocean.

Three of the giant bomber's crewmen were plucked safely from the sea, and a search continued for the other three, the U.S. command said. It said a mechanical problem was probably to blame.

As ground fire died down for the moment on the northern front lines, the Desert Storm allies pressed their relentless air war.

The U.S. command said the air campaign had passed the 40,000-sortie mark — some 10,000 more missions than were flown against Japan in the final 14 months of World War II.

Most major bridges in the Kuwait region have now been destroyed or badly damaged, the command said, and the Iraqis have had to throw makeshift pontoon spans across rivers — new easy targets, said command spokesman Marine Maj. Gen. Robert Johnston.

Air strikes Sunday rocked Iraq targets from Kuwait to Baghdad. Late in the afternoon, a missile — probably a U.S. cruise missile — slammed into downtown Baghdad, sending up a column of white smoke, according to an Associated Press report from the Iraqi capital.

Fresh reports came in of air attacks on civilian vehicles on the road from Baghdad to Jordan. Egyptians arriving in Jordan said their bus was the only vehicle on the road when it was repeatedly machine-gunned by warplanes. One of their group was killed, they said.

Since early in the 18-day-old war, the rumble of distant B-52 strikes has been heard from across the Saudi-Kuwaiti border. The huge bombers have zeroed in particularly on the dug-in positions of the Republican Guard, the core of Iraq's defense of occupied Kuwait.

Free Press former businessman's dream

KELLY BERG
Campus Editor

Once a week Jon Brake comes out of the building at 1510 Poyntz with several bundles of the Manhattan Free Press to deliver to residents of Manhattan.

This new newspaper is not produced in a bustling newsroom, but in a 20-foot square room containing a desk, a single Macintosh computer, a Hewlett Packard printer, some rubber cement, a paste-up table — and Jon Brake.

"It's a one-man operation," said Brake, who not only reports on and writes all the local articles, but also takes all the photographs, sells and designs all the advertisements, designs the page layouts, lays out the pages and delivers all the papers.

Brake, who has lived in Manhattan for the last 10 years, said he decided to make his life-long dream of being his own boss a reality by ending his career as a real estate broker in Manhattan, buying a computer, renting a room and starting in on the production of the first Manhattan Free Press newspaper, which was published Jan. 24.

"I've always wanted to work for myself," Brake said, "and starting my own paper is the only way I could do that and still live in Manhattan."

Brake said he is relying on his 20 years of experience in the newspaper business to help him get the paper out each week.

"But," he said, "I really got involved with the newspaper business by the back door — through advertising."

This experience with advertising has helped fill his 16-page paper with advertising.

Brake said he goes from business to business on the weekends finding people to advertise in his paper and has found that there are a lot of smaller businesses in Manhattan that want to advertise.

"I know there are plenty of advertising customers available in this town," he said. "It's just a matter of finding the time to make it to each one of them and tell them about the paper."

"The first employee I'll add will probably be an ad person," he said smiling, "to help me out in that department."

Brake said his goal is to have three employees within three months, and as many as 10 by the end of 1991.

"But first I need to be able to make the money to pay them," he said.

Another difference between his paper and the other existing papers in Manhattan is that the Manhattan Free Press will mostly cover local news.

"I love local news," he said. "I like covering things like city, county and school meetings and events."

Despite his desire to focus on local events, Brake uses the King Wire Service, picking up several different cartoons and columns.

Brake said you won't see his newspapers sitting in stores. Eventually it's going to be distributed by subscription only.

"My ego is just too big to see my papers thrown up and down the streets, getting stepped on," he said.

To avoid this, he has developed a system of dividing Manhattan into several different areas and delivering his paper to each home in one of those areas one week, then each of the homes in the next area the following week until he covers all of Manhattan. After the initial issue is delivered, he only plans to deliver papers

Soviet media criticizes Gorbachev

MOSCOW (AP) — A radio station that had been broadcasting news and commentaries critical of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev has been forced off the country's main airwaves, staff members said Sunday.

The move against Radio Rossiya, which had been on the air for just six weeks, was the latest attempt to halt media criticism of Gorbachev and the Soviet government.

Interfax, an independent news service, was forced out of its offices in the central television center, ostensibly for failure to pay its bills.

A government-controlled printing plant has refused to publish Civil Dignity, the weekly newspaper of the small Constitutional Democratic Party. It had a circulation of 75,000.

Together, the steps against the media have raised doubt about the continued strength of Gorbachev's policy of glasnost, or openness. The Soviet press still exercises far more independent, critical judgment than it did before Gorbachev took power in 1985.

Earthquake's death toll increasing

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — As many as 400 people may have been killed in Afghanistan during last week's earthquake, aid workers said Sunday.

That could bring to more than 700 the number of people who were killed in the quake, which was felt from Soviet Central Asia to India on Friday.

In Pakistan, government officials said more than 300 people had died and hundreds more were injured. But that figure was expected to rise as officials receive reports from remote, mountain villages hardest hit by the quake.

The Afghan government initially said five people had been killed and dozens more injured, then released no further figures.

Letter postage raises to 29 cents

WASHINGTON (AP) — It's official: Mailing a letter now costs 29 cents.

After nearly a year of hearings and study, higher postal rates took effect Sunday.

The new first-class rate is 29 cents for the first ounce and 23 cents for each additional ounce. Sending a post card now costs 19 cents.

And just about all other mail will cost more, too.

The new rates were imposed after nearly a year of study and hearings.

Special "F" stamps featuring a flower are available at post offices to cover the new rate until official 29-cent stamps are printed.

In addition, so-called make-up stamps worth 4-cents (although they don't show any amount on them) are available. Those stamps, combined with a 25-cent stamp, represent the new 29-cent rate.

Budget predicts largest-ever deficit

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush on Monday will send to Congress a $1.4 trillion spending blueprint for 1992 that will project the largest budget deficits in the nation's history while counting on America's allies to keep the Persian Gulf War from making that deficit even worse.

The administration also will propose sharp cutbacks in Medicare, including restraints on benefits received by more well-to-do recipients, to keep the government's tide of red ink from rising even higher.

White House Budget Director Richard Darman said Sunday the administration is forecasting that the Persian Gulf War will cost the United States $15 billion, with another $51 billion of the tab picked up by its allies.

The $15 billion in extra costs projected for this year will be financed through additional borrowing, Darman said.

Francisco disappointed about role

WICHITA (AP) — Lt. Gov. Jim Francisco said he likes his new job running the Governor's Constituent Services Office in Wichita, but admits to some disappointment about the role given him by Gov. Joan Finney.

After spending 24 years in the Kansas Legislature, Francisco said he misses the close involvement with the lawmaking process, something he had expected to continue as Finney's legislative liaison.

"That was my life for 24 years," Francisco said in an interview with the Wichita Eagle. "I got elected to the House at 25 years of age ... so all but four years of my adult life have been spent in the House of Senate. And yes, I miss that. I went through the campaign thinking that was what I was going to do."

"But I said, often, that I'd do whatever she asked me to do," he said. "And at this time this is what she's asking me to do, and I want to do a good job at it."

The lieutenant governor acknowledged strained relations with some members of Finney's staff, but disputed interpretations that he had been exiled to Topeka.

14-year-old shoots police officer

GRAIN VALLEY, Mo. (AP) — A bulletproof vest saved the life of a police officer when the 14-year-old boy he was chasing turned and fired two shots from a .357 Magnum revolver.

Sgt. Scott Lambert was struck in the stomach and in the ribs when he was shot Friday night. Lambert was released from the hospital Sunday after being treated for wounds caused when the bullets pushed the vest into his skin.

"At first you don't think it can happen with young kids in a small town," said Officer Rick Barney, Lambert's partner who took the 14-year-old's companion into custody after he pointed a gun at him. "But it can happen any place."

After Lambert wrestled the 14-year-old to the ground, the boy pointed the gun at his face.

Concert forum for stroking star egos

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

The New Kids on the Block visited Bramlage Coliseum Friday night — only they were in drag and called themselves Poison.

Complete with taped background vocals, choreographed dance moves and loads of merchandise (panties for $10), Poison played a well-rehearsed set to a crowd made up mostly of pre-pubescent and their parents. The only good thing about the show was that they were fairly energetic.

I came prepared. With me were resident heavy metal experts Andy Crowe and Andy "A+" Sample. They do that "Metalhead" show on KSDB-FM that makes them rock aficionados, right? Anyway, Poison opened the show with "Look What the Cat Dragged In" and a couple of concussion bombs to get everyone's attention, but A+ was still looking at all the girls.

After the first two songs it became painfully clear that all the background vocals were being lip-synched. When bassist Bobby Dall stepped away from the microphone, the crystal clear vocals (they were digital, even!) kept on going.

Reviewer says ...

+ IT WAS AWFUL

Poison traipsed through some songs from their two most recent albums, "Open up and Say...Aahh" and "Flesh and Blood," when they began to tire. The obvious solution was a drum solo. Singer Bret Michaels turned toward the drum set and urged drummer Rikki Rocket on with his pelvis. As Michaels' thrusts became faster, so did Rocket's bass drum, until he exploded into a drum solo.

In the first stage of the solo, he used his regular set-up — a quadruple bass kit with fluorescent orange hardware and the logo from "A Clockwork Orange" on each bass drum head. Later, he played with brushes on a smaller set while some taped drums resounded through the coliseum.

When the band returned to the stage, guitarist C.C. DeVille had his hair redone, so it was lively and fluffy for the next couple of songs. "Something to Believe In" brought the crowd to its feet as Michaels effectively dodged both sides of an issue he chose to bring up.

"I've got some friends fighting over in that bullshit war," Michaels said.

I turned to Andy. "Oh, so he's against the war."

"But it's about time for the United States to kick some ass," Michaels proudly exclaimed seconds later.

The audience erupted with cheers as two American flags on either side of the stage were illuminated. Political correctness is very important in the big time world of arena rock and "Something to Believe In" exemplifies this perfectly. Each verse is about a different politically correct issue. The Andys and I checked our shoes for bubblegum.

Opening act Don Dokken (rhymes with rockin') proclaimed that this was the "Rock Against Rap" tour.

"If that's what the 1990s are going to be like, then I'd rather stay in the 1980s!" Dokken exclaimed. OK by me, Don.

His new band consisted of musicians from numerous failed heavy metal bands (Europe, Accept, etc.), but they were well-schooled in the art of MTV preening and posing.

Dokken played "Alone Again," a song from his old band, by himself with an acoustic guitar. His voice was in fine form — he was the only one the entire night who could sing — but he couldn't keep time with his guitar while he was singing. Don stressed that he was in a new band now and what's past was past right before launching into an old Dokken standard "Into the Fire."

In an interview before the show, Dokken called Poison a pop band and said he couldn't wait to get off the tour. But, like Poison, he just told people what they wanted to hear. "We're having a great time partying with Poison!" he shouted at the beginning of the set.

The key word for the evening was FAKE. I was ready to have a good time, but when the performers are only in it to stroke their own bloated rock star egos and make money off $30 T-shirts, it makes you feel like a pawn.

Change to slow science study

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

The Farrell Library expansion proposal favored by the consulting firm who engineered it has left some faculty members of the science departments with some unanswered questions about the future of their branch libraries.

The plan, unveiled at a morning press conference Jan. 31, states the best way to go with expansion is to combine the specialized science libraries for Math/Physics and Chemistry/Biochemistry into a larger centralized library in Farrell itself.

The train of thought behind that decision is the specialized branches are inadequate in seating and future expandability. The report also states the collections of those libraries are split between the branches and Farrell, resulting in split collections. The firm's argument is a centralized library would be more convenient, efficient and easier to staff.

"I think that is a crock," said Richard McDonald, professor of chemistry. "The farther away you move our libraries the less convenience it is to the user. It would have a detrimental effect on our research."

As it stands now, the Chemistry/Biochemistry library in Willard Hall is right across the way from the Chemistry/Biochemistry building and King Hall. McDonald said the relatively short distance makes the building convenient, a convenience that would be removed if the collections were moved to Farrell.

McDonald also said the branch libraries are readily accessible so any time an idea strikes — be it night or day — he can go to the Willard library.

"I would say 60 percent of the ideas I end up researching in off hours pay off," McDonald said. "That means money, people and research."

But McDonald's argument against the expansion plans stops short of condemning the entire project. He said any improvement to Farrell would be good.

"I am certainly in agreement with Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock," he said. "We need better space. I think any improvement to Farrell Library is good. However, I am against the centralization of the science branches. Our libraries are not only convenient but necessary."

The inadequacy of Farrell may preclude any argument against its expansion. Hobrock said at this juncture the plan to close the branches appears to be the most sound.

"It has been recommended by the consultants," Hobrock said, "but any eventual decision will involve the individual departments."

Hobrock said he understood the arguments against the closing of the branches, and as to the level of service a new centralized library would be able to provide to students of the sciences, he said it would be his hope that it would not change.

"It is not our intention to diminish the value of service," Hobrock said.

Legislative panel eats, discusses new tax plan

RYAN HAYTER

Governor Joan Finney's controversial new tax plan was discussed by a critical Legislative panel at the Manhattan Eggs and Issues breakfast Saturday morning.

Kansas Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, along with five state representatives and senators, spoke to a crowd of more than 100 people about developments in the three-week-old Legislative session. "By far, the thing talked about most in the early weeks of this session has been Joan Finney's tax plan," Kerr said. "There is a concern of where the money will come from."

He listed a proposed gasoline sales tax, residential utility bill tax, and trucking service tax as only a few examples of the 112-point Finney proposal that will affect all Kansans.

"The 70 million dollar trucking service tax proposal would count for 10 percent of the entire plan," he said. "We all use products that have been trucked. If a tax is added to that

Ribbons, stickers say a lot about nation

"But your flag decal won't get you into Heaven anymore. It's already overcrowded from your dirty little war. Now, Jesus don't like killing, no matter what the reason's for, and your flag decal won't get you into Heaven anymore." —John Prine

Years before I ever heard a John Prine tape, I knew that Americans loved stickers. My third-grade teacher stuck one on every assignment she handed back to us. Sometimes she'd give you two if you were very good or very bad, or if she bought more than she needed.

On Washington's Birthday (observed), I got a crayola drawing of the father of our country back from class the day before. Mrs. Corona (the woman I blame for my horrid handwriting because she made us write with dinky little pencils) had festooned the sky above the terribly drawn general with blue Smurf and Smurfette stickers and, most horrifying, two American flag decals where George Washington's eyes should have been. She really loved stickers.

I don't know where she is now. She quit when I was in fifth grade. She might not be teaching anymore, but I'm sure that the trail of stickers has followed her to wherever she is.

I can easily imagine what her car must look like today. Flag decals on the hood ornament, rotating in a design on each tire, of course there are "Support Desert Storm" and "Kick Ass U.S.A." bumperstickers on the rear and front bumpers, and proudly flapping in the highway wind, the yellow ribbon Glen Campbell sings about, tied to the car antenna. She also loved ribbons.

Americans love ribbons almost as much as they love stickers. Ribbons would be more popular, except it takes so much time to tie a ribbon to something. But people seem to be putting forth the required effort. I've seen yellow ribbons tied around: lampposts, oak trees (the only thing they're supposed to be tied around), tall buildings in New York, porch supports, Louisville Sluggers, football goalposts, snowmen, and the Washington Monument.

And phallic objects are not alone in this mass decoration. The fence of Bluemont School, next to where I live, is adorned from Juliette Avenue to Eighth Street with these ... things. The children, I believe, were tricked into this symbolism by their own Mrs. Corona. I believe that these children were led into the schoolyard and told to practice tying their shoes. I can hear it now: "Here, Johnny, here's fifty ribbons. Now pretend that this quadrant of fence is your shoe, and that these yellow ribbons are shoelaces ... What do you mean your parents were at Woodstock?"

Ed Skoog

These ribbons have been up for about two months now. Several yards of ribbon have been replaced, since many were torn down by visitors to my house, or were discolored by constant exposure to the elements (earth, wind and fire, plus mud).

The older ribbons are off-white. I guess whoever is in charge of ribbon-buying couldn't get a good match for the second batch, because the newer ribbons are closer in the color spectrum to green than to the yellow of the original ribbons but the intention is clearly there.

And what is the intention of a yellow ribbon? What does one mean?

Several things:

- Bring our troops home safely, or
- We're thinking about our troops, or
- We don't think this will be another long drawn out war like Vietnam, or perhaps
- We support the war, but maybe
- We don't support the war but we support our troops, or conversely
- We don't support our troops but we support the war...

The fact is, there are as many meanings as there are ribbons. Just like Mrs. Corona had stickers ranging in comment from "Good job, bucko," to "Smurfette thinks there's room for Smurfimprovement."

We love stickers and ribbons because they are, above all else, cheap. Someone once told me that the definition of an American is someone who is "cheap, tacky, and proud of it." What better way to express your cheapness, your tackiness and your pride than with a cheap and tacky item that one can proudly display from a piece of property?

The Palace, a gift store in Aggieville that specializes in cheap and tacky goods, sells a package which I bought and quickly distributed in the newsroom. Four sheets, eight flags a sheet, sells for only $1.25. They had smaller, furry flags that a person could buy by the roll. They also had Desert Storm bumperstickers with a camouflage background. The bin where they kept the yellow ribbons was empty. How sad.

But how fortuitous for the fabric companies! In New York there are probably hundreds of illegal sweat shops manned by illegal immigrant women and their children. While other industries take nose dives, notably housing contractors and Outer Limits-type strip joints near army bases, two industries will emerge from the war sound and strong: the defense industry and the Ribbon Manufacturing Alliance of America.

The proliferation of ribbons and stickers is a fine example of supply causing demand. If these attachable knick-knacks weren't plentiful and inexpensive, we wouldn't be any worse off. But since their presence is unavoidable, we'll buy 'em and stick 'em to any surface; tie 'em to any protuberance.

Mrs. Corona's question: "What is so wrong with displaying our concern, when young men and women are dying horribly in the gulf region?"

John Prine's answer: "I got my window-shield so full of flags, I couldn't see. So I ran my car right off the road/ and right into a tree...and I'll never understand/ why the man/ standing at the pearly gates said/ that your flag decal won't get you into Heaven anymore..."

Use of nuclear weapons wrong for any situation

It is a seductive evil.

In temptation, it offers a seemingly easy, relatively clean and possibly quick end to the Persian Gulf War. It promises an opportunity to avoid the thousands of deaths the United States can expect from a ground offensive against Iraq. It is terrifying to mention, and horrifying that it should even be contemplated. Yet, such contemplation may already be underway at the highest levels of our government.

"It" is the employment of nuclear weapons against Iraq.

The bomb has a dual nature in the American mind. For 46 years we have been taught that nuclear weapons ended one world war and staved off another. We have also been taught that these weapons must never again be used, for to do so would not only mean megadeath purchased by megatonnage but unimaginable environmental disruption and the end of the advance of human civilization, if not humanity itself.

Last week, a member of Congress suggested the United States detonate one, or some, of the least destructive of its vast arsenal of nuclear weapons over Iraq.

The congressman's statement may, in fact, be a trial balloon launched by the administration to discover what sort of reaction the American people may have to such a suggestion.

On a scale of destructiveness, nuclear weapons transcend all we may imagine. In less than a second, they can eliminate a city and all its inhabitants. Even a small one, such as a tactical nuclear weapon, can lay waste to an area two miles in circumference, making dust of all that resides therein.

But the death visited by a nuclear explosion would not end with the passage of the shockwave. While thousands would die immediately, equal or greater numbers would die from burns and radiation in the days and weeks to follow. And those who survive would carry within themselves, and pass on to their children, time bombs of cancer and birth defects which could explode decades later.

The thought of using a tactical nuclear weapon offers a unique temptation to the American character. The use of a nuclear weapon promises a technological answer to the long-term social and political challenges raised by U.S. involvement in the gulf war. It would seem that in the few microseconds it takes for a bomb's nuclear mass to go supercritical, the war and its pain would go away.

Against an enemy portrayed as amoral as Saddam Hussein, it even seems fair to use the bomb.

It would only be fair if we were willing to sink to Hussein's moral level. There are no quick fixes or easy answers to the problems of the Middle East. The United States will probably be involved there for a long time to come, and at a heavy price in American lives.

Only by respecting the principle that even in war the means must suit the ends, can the United States maintain its moral credibility and become a force for peace once the shooting stops. Then will the sacrifice of our soldiers be worth it.

By dropping a nuclear bomb on Iraq we will lose that opportunity, and with it, thousands of lives in vain. We will become what we oppose and lose ourselves, as well.

Letters

Homemaker sorry

Editor,

Someday there will be a generation of young people that will turn to the older generation and say, "Before you send us out to die, show us that the killing fields of war are the last resort. If we are dying for oil, show us your energy programs for the last 10 years. Show us the letters each of you wrote to demand that the government implement long-range energy policies and research programs."

"If we are dying to diminish the weapons capabilities of a country, show us we are not to be killed retrieving the weapons you gave to that country. Each of you, show us the letters you wrote to your legislators demanding a sane weapons control policy."

"If we are dying to stop a madman, understand we can only die once, and there are so very many madmen. Show us the letters you wrote to your legislators demanding this country not deny our ideals in order to gain a 'momentary ally,' only to deny and then war with that same 'ally' a few years later. "And before you teach us to kill all the innocent 'victims of war,' show us the letters you have written to your legislators demanding a consistent, practical, long-range foreign policy we can all live with instead of kill and die for."

"Before you send us to war, show us how much you tried, because your silence could be the biggest killer of all."

"We acknowledge that our generation will pass to our children a set of government policies. These policies will be created through our thought and participation or through our silence. But right now, it's your time. Each of you, show us how hard you tried!"

I wrote this in November; I wanted to "wake-up" my generation to demand a peaceful solution. My God, on behalf of my entire generation, I am so sorry we have brought you war ... what a failure of policy.

Those kids stranded on the desert were on my mind constantly. I wrote to 35 government representatives and the entire United Nations Security Council, contacted two newspapers and made 10 calls to Washington, D.C. — five votes in Senate. My God, you don't go to war unless people care enough to enlist. My God, those kids ... We owe you young people. I continue to work to end the war and bring as many home as soon as can be.

Draft unfair

Editor,

The section "Another Perspective" in the Jan. 31 Collegian stated that a draft would ensure the distribution of responsibility for a war among all Americans. Let's take a look at our last "war" (Vietnam) as an example of how a draft really works.

More than 57 percent of Vietnam era draft-age men were deferred, exempted or disqualified from military service. There were college deferments, and yes, enrollments soared. Other strategies for avoiding the draft included: getting into an occupation that was draft deferred (i.e. medicine); attorneys provided draft counseling for fees ranging up to $1,000, and for anyone who found a competent lawyer, avoiding the draft was virtually assured; draft counselors directed men to certain draft boards in order to obtain exemptions (letters from doctors or psychiatrists helped); individuals could be exempted for orthodontic work (a dentist in Los Angeles would put braces on anyone who could afford them); and some even had their bodies mutilated (i.e. had their fingers cut off). In fact, most of the alternatives for avoiding the draft and combat in Vietnam were restricted to those with money and education.

By 1970, draftees comprised 39 percent of the troops in Vietnam, but almost 55 percent of combat deaths. A Wisconsin survey found that out of 100 draftees in one district, every one of them had come from families with an annual income of less than $5,000. In 1966, only 2 percent of all draftees were college graduates. A survey conducted with 1,200 Harvard men found that only 56 had served in the military, and that only two had served in Vietnam. A 1970 report of senators and congressmen found that not a single one had a son killed in Vietnam. Barry Goldwater Jr. did his "alternative service" in the House of Representatives. And please, let's not talk about Dan Quayle.

Issue resurfaces

Editor,

I was hoping that the defeat of the referendum concerning enlarging the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex would send a message that the students of K-State either don't want the referendum passed, or that they think that other areas (such as educational areas) need to be addressed first. But the article concerning the Rec Complex's overcrowding is obviously an attempt to get the situation back in the minds of the student body.

It is obvious the author of the article either has a short memory or chooses to ignore the problems that K-State is facing. The budget cuts have led to such things as reorganization and some departmental curtailments. Such things as our student publications, which I'm sure are used in some way affect at least 78 percent of our student body, are facing severe financial circumstances. And of course the state of Farrell Library has not changed much over Christmas break. The protest of architecture students was heartening; a sign that many people realize the priorities the University should have.

Having to even spend time justifying expenditures for educational purposes, rather than the Rec Complex (which is a luxury, not a necessity), is a rather sobering occurrence. I hope that Mr. Wicker's attitudes are not shared by many. I liken this attitude to that of a grade-school child sitting in class, listening to the teacher, while all the time thinking of that magical half-hour of recess. It is disturbing to think that at this critical time in our education, many of us are only thinking of how big a playground we want.

Germany, Japan not in war

Countries contribute money, not troops due to treaties

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

Many Americans are wondering where our allies are when they read the Persian Gulf War might take as many as 30,000 lives among U.S. forces and cost $1 billion per day.

At the center of that debate are Germany and Japan. According to Buddy Gray, professor of history, each has committed several billion dollars to the war but no troops. "Germany's constitution was written in agreement with the allies after World War II. Because everyone remembered the aggressiveness of Germany during that war, there was a real question of whether or not they should even have an army," said Gray. "It was resolved by saying they should have an army for defense purposes only."

Ronald Fuessel, graduate student in history who is from Germany, said Germany has a strong military, but it is not allowed to be in any action outside NATO territory. Every German male is required to serve in the military for 15 months. Conscientious objectors and those that have medical problems are allowed to serve in a civil-service job for 18 months.

"There's a strong anti-war sentiment in Germany," said Gray. "I think it's politically not quite as easy for the German government to commit troops because people in Germany experienced World War II in a very personal way. They know the horrors of warfare.

"I understand in Berlin that the daily traffic reports are telling where war demonstrations are, so if you need to drive through the city, you can avoid them. That's how prevalent demonstrations are."

Fuessel said Germany has a strong tradition of war demonstrations.

"Germans and Europeans are very critical," said Fuessel. "More critical than the Americans. We want always to question everything, especially our government. We could get 200,000 demonstrators together easily. The spirit of '68 and anti-Vietnam kind of stuff is pretty much still alive in Germany."

Fuessel said Germany does not have a critical need to participate in the war because of dependence on Middle East oil.

"Only 2 to 3 percent of our oil is from that area," said Fuessel. "We get most of our oil from the North Sea, Britain, Norway and Saudi Arabia. In a way, we really shouldn't be concerned about it because it doesn't affect our economy. But never the less, people are quite nervous about it."

Gray said Germany has other interests in the Middle East.

"Germany has a strong and aggressive economy, and a lot of companies are involved in the sale of munitions and defense hardware," he said. "They're selling stuff to anybody who will buy it."

Fuessel said he also believes Germany's economy has a strong base in weapons production.

"We have a lot of companies that are specializing in weapons. Germany's chemical weapons industry is leading in the world," said Fuessel. "I think that most of the chemical weapons Iraq has, they got from Germany. But that's hard to say because a lot of European companies are multi-national. There are companies in France and Britain, and parts of the weapons are assembled in each country."

Ken Jones, professor of history, said Japan's industries also obtain their oil from other sources.

"People in America are asking, 'Why aren't they terrified?' But after the oil scare of the 1970s, Japan responded in a very rational way," Jones said. "They initiated a national energy policy and cut back oil consumption. There's a lot of oil available from other sources. I don't think they see it as a big threat."

"After all, what can you do with oil?" said Jones. "You can't eat oil no matter who controls it. Spreading it on the desert sure won't grow crops."

One aspect of the war debated in both countries, as well as the United States, is whether the allied force is really representative of the United Nations.

"This is an unusual and unprecedented situation," said Gray. "The only other situation like this is Korea. This business of the U.S. Army organizing the armies, led by the United States, acting on behalf of the United Nations is really impressive. First, that the United Nations has met such decisive agreement, and secondly, that it was carried out by the armed forces of a self-selected nation."

"My concern about this is that it's not a U.N. force and it is really an American-led military action."

This sentiment was echoed by Fuessel.

"I think there are too many American soldiers over there. It should be more in the spirit of the United Nations," said Fuessel. "It looks pretty much like an American war."

Woman designs gulf 'freedom ring'

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

In order to show her hope for the safe return of her son from the Persian Gulf, a Kansas City mother has asked Krigel's Jewelers to design a "freedom ring."

"I wanted something that went beyond the traditional yellow ribbon," said Vicki Russum, mother of a soldier in the Persian Gulf. "I wanted something that would last and that took my support just one step further."

She got the idea for the ring from a similar idea from World War II. The World War II ring was made for family members of soldiers and was a symbol of freedom.

Russum went to Scott Krigel, president of Krigel's Jewelers, and asked him to help her design a ring similar to the the World War II ring. Together they designed a ring to help commemorate her patriotism and dedication to her son and the other men and women serving in the Persian Gulf.

"Let Freedom Ring" is the name that Krigel's has given to identify this keepsake ring," said Helene Eichenwald, director of public relations at Krigel's Jewelers. "The ring is custom crafted out of solid gold or sterling silver. The detailing is precise with white enameled stars on a blue band, highlighted by red and white hand enameled stripes that form the shape of a shield.

"USA is engraved on each side of the enameled red, white and blue shield. The ring is available with one, two or three stars, each star representing a loved one serving our country," Eichenwald said.

The ring seems to be gaining popularity, Eichenwald said. On Jan. 30, the first advertisement for the ring was displayed in USA Today, which has given it national attention. Also, Russum has appeared on the 10 p.m. news in Kansas City for KCTV and WDAF.

Eichenwald did a radio spot for 980 KMBZ, out of Kansas City, as further promotion of the ring.

"A portion of the proceeds from 'Let Freedom Ring' will go to benefit the American Red Cross' service to military families," Eichenwald said.

AWOL

ber of casualties expected in a ground war to military hospitals.

Following the church rally, which was attended by 100 people, Huet-Vaughn was escorted to a car amid tight security provided by members of area peace groups for the short drive across the state line to Kansas City, Kan. She faces 15 years in prison, a fine and a dishonorable discharge from the military.

Outside the church, about 25 supporters of the war held up signs and jeered at Huet-Vaughn as she was escorted to the car. One sign read, "Huet-Vaughn/ Go to jail/Go directly to jail." War supporters yelled "Send her to Leavenworth" and called Huet-Vaughn a "bitch."

Huet-Vaughn rejoined the reserves six days before Iraq invaded Kuwait in order to fulfill her obligation to the service, which helped pay for medical school. Huet-Vaughn emphasized that the Army did not pay for her medical education.

"I got paid for the drills I did. I didn't have a military scholarship or a tuition stipend," she said.

She said she does not intend to file for conscientious objector status.

While assigned to an Independence, Mo., Army Reserve medical company, Huet-Vaughn had been attached to a Topeka medical evacuation hospital that completed deployment to Saudi Arabia from Fort Riley last week.

Originally, organizers of the rally had planned to drive Huet-Vaughn to Fort Riley for her surrender. But Army officials told her lawyers that she must face court-martial at Fort Leonard Wood.

Also speaking at the church rally was actress Margot Kidder, who played Lois Lane in the "Superman" movies. Kidder has stated her support for peace groups and activists in the past.

One of the signs held by a protester outside the church read "Superman has lousy taste."

A brief yelling match took place between one of Huet-Vaughn's supporters and war supporters as she was taken to the car for the drive to the courthouse. Several of Huet-Vaughn's supporters began singing, "We Shall Overcome" as the doctor walked to the car.

Some information for this report was provided by the Associated Press.

Army will not jail doctor at Fort Leonard Wood

By the Associated Press

FORT LEONARD WOOD, Mo.

—The Army decided Sunday that a Reserve doctor it has classified as a deserter does not need to be jailed at Fort Leonard Wood.

Capt. Yolanda Huet-Vaughn was returned to the control of her unit commander following a pre-trial confinement hearing, said Brad Rose, a spokesman at the fort.

Rose declined to say more about what restrictions were placed on Huet-Vaughn, who had surrendered Saturday after leaving her unit when it was activated Dec. 20.

Military authorities were continuing to investigate and evaluate the case, Rose said.

Huet-Vaughn said she left her unit because of opposition to the Persian Gulf War.

"You (President Bush) ask me to support the killing of hundreds of thousands. For what — oil?" Huet-Vaughn said Saturday as she was driven to the federal courthouse in Kansas City, Kan. to surrender herself.

She gave herself up after appearing at a rally at a Kansas City, Mo. church attended by about 250 people, including actress Margot Kidder.

Huet-Vaughn said that although she initially joined the reserves as a non-combatant and was willing to provide medical services in a war, her views have changed and she no longer believes in a just war.

The 39-year-old mother of three, who rejoined the reserves six days before Iraq invaded Kuwait, said the Bush administration has deceived the American people.

She said she also disapproved of the military policy obligating her to treat allied soldiers before treating more seriously wounded enemy soldiers.

CONFERENCE

principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1991 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty. You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 21. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

SPORTS MONDAY

'Cats escape CU by scant inches

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

K-State didn't have to go to the locker-room to search for answers Saturday.

The Wildcats finally had a few on the court as they squeaked past Colorado 73-72 in Bramlage Coliseum. K-State hauled a big monkey of its back in the process.

"I can't remember the last time I did an interview with a smile on my face," said Jeff Wires, who led K-State with 22 points.

'Cats 73, CU 72

Thanks to the toes on Colorado guard Stevie Wise's left foot, the 'Cats were able to celebrate a Big Eight Conference win, their first in six tries.

Wise dropped in a shot from the left wing with one second remaining that was supposed to tie the game at 73.

But officials ruled and television replay concluded that Wise stepped on the three-point line, leaving the Buffaloes down by one.

"It was definitely a two-point shot," Colorado Coach Joe Harrington said. "It was a good call. The play was executed well, and we just didn't get the three."

K-State ran out the last three-tenths of a second to give the Buffs their 55th-straight conference road loss, keeping the gauntlet alive for Harrington and his team.

"The streak goes on, in case you're counting," Harrington said. "Where in the Big Eight is a friendly place to Colorado when you've lost 55 straight road games?"

Bramlage almost turned into a haven for the Buffs, which fell to 12-7 overall and 2-4 in league play. Colorado, behind center Shaun Vandiver's 26 points, fought back from a 12-point first-half deficit to tie the game at 46 with 12:46 remaining.

Vandiver carried CU on a day when Wise,

Conference race too wacky

David Svoboda

Sports Editor

Go figure.

Just when you thought it was safe to pencil in Nebraska as a prohibitive favorite to win the Big Eight men's basketball title, Sports Illustrated had to go and run a story about the 'Huskies.

You know what happened next. Nebraska was bombed on its home floor Saturday by Oklahoma State, 81-68, giving the Cowboys a ton of momentum and leaving Nebraska coach Danny Nee all but in awe.

"I just felt the better basketball team won," Nee said. "Oklahoma State came in, they played really sound defense, they took care of the ball on offense and executed much better than we did."

With the win, Oklahoma State moved into a three-way tie for first with Nebraska and Kansas for the lead in the league.

The Cowboys are athletic, and they've garnered a pair of key wins in the last week. On top of it all, they've got the man who's arguably the league's best player — Byron Houston — and one whale of a coach in Eddie Sutton. They'll finish second.

Don't look for Nebraska's fortunes to improve anytime soon. They play the Jayhawks Wednesday in Lawrence in a game — though it will just mean we've reached the halfway point of the conference season — that may well be for the conference title.

A bit dramatic? Well, maybe. But if Nebraska were to venture in to Allen Fieldhouse and escape with a win, they will have won in Norman, Okla., Manhattan and Lawrence. That's a Bermuda Triangle of Big Eight hoops if there ever was one. Three road wins would give anyone a leg up on a crown.

Here's betting that KU will keep Nebraska from getting that advantage. Nebraska — a football school — will finish third in basketball this year. And the Jayhawks are a solid choice to win the championship. At least they look solid this week.

Kansas is coming off a pair of road wins of its own — over K-State and Iowa State.

"The last four or five games, they've been playing super," said Iowa State coach Johnny Orr of Kansas.

He's right.

KU has one of the league's most consistent performers in Mark Randall and the one of the best — if not the best — coaches in Roy Williams.

Why is it possible that Nebraska could finish fourth or fifth? Answer: Oklahoma and Missouri. Remember these two traditional powers? With the emergence of Nebraska and Oklahoma State from the league's bottom half, these two perennial titlists are now relegated to fighting for fourth.

But both are loaded with talent and with a few breaks either could win it all. But neither will. Oklahoma and Missouri will finish fourth and fifth.

That leaves K-State sixth, Iowa State seventh and Colorado eighth. At least for this week.

Forward has strong outing

Amerson scores 11 in Wildcat home triumph over Buffs

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

Intensity and enthusiasm are often key factors in a team pulling off a big win. Keith Amerson knows this.

In addition to an 11-point, eight-rebound statistical effort, Amerson took on the role of team motivator in K-State's 73-72 win over Colorado Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

He said there comes a time in a close game when someone needs to come forward and be a leader.

"I was trying to get my teammates into it," he said. "I told them that we control the outcome, we've got to fight, and it starts right here."

Not only was Amerson encouraging his teammates but also the Bramlage crowd.

"I tried to do something to motivate the crowd and the players," he said.

Late in the game, Amerson could be seen at half court raising his hands, encouraging the home crowd to come to its feet.

"I was waving my arms and getting results," he said.

He said it is important for the home crowd to be behind the team in a close game.

"When the crowd is into it, good things happen to our basketball team," he said.

Playing hard is one of those good things, he said. And if you play hard you prevail.

"Having the crowd behind you pushes you over the top. It gives you that extra adrenaline," he said.

Amerson answered Coach Dana Altman's call for a team leader late in the game.

"Keith stepped up and challenged the team to do something," Altman said. "He competed well and gave us some leadership."

Amerson has rebounded from a mid-season slump plagued by foul trouble and inconsistent shooting.

Amerson opened the game for the Cats by hitting a three-pointer and continued to make his presence known, both offensively and defensively. He finished the contest a perfect 5-for-5 from the floor.

"It's not how big you are, it's how big you play," he said. "Today I played big."

Collecting eight boards is a good day's work for the 6-foot-4 senior, who averaged 5.3 per game for the season going into Saturday's contest against the Buffaloes.

Amerson said it is natural for a player to fill a leadership position when he is having a good game.

"When you're feeling it, you're going to step up and be a leader," he said.

Amerson's animation, along with the Cats' having an answer for everything Colorado threw at them down the stretch, spelled doom for the Buffaloes.

Amerson said he feels the Cats' nabbing their first conference win will be a weight off the team's shoulders.

"We knew we had to find somewhere to start," he said. "We look at this as the start of something new."

Track teams finish 2nd at NU

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

They didn't head to Lincoln with the whole team, but K-State's men's and women's track teams returned from the Nebraska Triangular Saturday with a pair of second-place finishes.

Nebraska captured victories in both the men's and women's competitions with 67 and 61 points respectively.

The K-State women finished only eight points behind defending Big Eight Champion Nebraska to possibly add a little perspective to the women's competition at the upcoming Big Eight Championships.

This is considering the fact that long- and triple-jumper Dee Dee Tribue and All-Americans Janet Haskin and Angie Miller did not compete in the meet for K-State.

Coach John Capriotti said he wanted to focus on the individual performances instead the team competition going into this meet.

"Had we entered all the women, I think we would have won the meet, but that wasn't our goal," he said.

The women garnered five first-place finishes, including a career best of 6-1 1/4 from All-American high jumper Connie Teaberry.

"That is probably one of the better jumps in the country so far this year," Capriotti said.

Paulette Staats (4:52.84), Jennifer Hillier (4:56.55) and Janet Treiber (4:56.87) swept the women's mile run and all set personal records.

K-State also had first place performances from Debra Malone in the 600-yard run (1:25.59), Verida Walter in the 55-meter hurdles (8.25) and Dione Singleton in the shot put (44.9%).

Capriotti said he was pleased with the men's performance against Nebraska.

"We were missing seven guys and gave Nebraska a pretty good run considering I didn't enter the meet to score a lot of points," he said.

The men's team had individual first place performances by Jared Storm in the 1,000-meter run (2:28.03), Clifton Etheridge in the long jump (23-0 1/4), and Kelly Zart in the pole vault (15-8 1/4).

The men's 4x400-meter relay team of Corey King, Marcus Wright, Ernest Green and Tyrone Watkins captured first place with a time of 3:15.85.

Capriotti said he felt the goal of turning in improved performances was met at the meet.

"Overall, the day went pretty well," he said. "Everyone looked like they were coming on a little bit."

K-State women's second place finishes: Shanelle Stiras, shot put (44-5 1/4); Debra Malone, 55-meter hurdles (8.33); Gwen Wentland, high jump (5-10 1/4); and Laura Ostmeier, 1,000-meter run (2:55.61).

K-State men's second place finishes: R.D. Cogswell, high jump (6-11); Phil Byrne, mile run (4:13.36); Tyrone Watkins, 400-meter dash (48.07); Marcus Wright, 600-meter dash (1:11.01); Eric Harland, long jump (22-6 1/4); and Thomas Randolph, 60-meter dash (6.31).

Weary Lady Cats have enough to down MU

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

After playing two overtime games in four days, it was all the K-State Lady Cats could do to squeak by the University of Missouri Tigers, 66-62, Saturday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We needed that game," K-State Coach Susan Yow said. "After the last two games we needed that game. It will set up the next two games on the road for us."

The two games before the Missouri game were overtime wins — a 78-72 win over Oklahoma State and a 74-73 win over the University of Kansas. But what the Lady Cat players may have lost was their own legs from underneath them.

"We needed the bench tonight, after what we've been through the last week," Yow said. "We needed them tonight because we were tired."

Missouri, 7-14 and 0-8, was able to take advantage of the weary Lady

Cat play and took the lead a couple of times in the contest.

"Missouri played a much better game here than when we played them there," Yow said of the Jan. 16 contest that K-State won 68-53.

Lady Cats 66, MU 62

The Lady Cats, 13-6 and 6-2, seemed sluggish most of the game, as they committed 13 turnovers in the first half.

K-State had two leads — one of 10 points and another of nine — only to see them evaporate and force the Lady Cats to plod their way to a 34-31 halftime advantage.

In the second half, Missouri took advantage of the Lady Cats lackluster play and started to run a little bit more as they were able to take a seven point lead, 53-46, with 9:36 remaining.

At that point the Lady Cats seemed to get their legs back and outscored Missouri 22-9 in the remaining time enroute to the win.

If K-State had one leg up on the competition it was the play of senior guard Nadira Hazim. Hazim finished the game with 25 points on 9-of-14 shooting, including two three-pointers.

Missouri Coach Joann Rutherford said it was the play of Hazim down the stretch that made the difference.

"Well, she just started hitting everything, and when you foul her ... and her defense on our players, well it speaks for itself.

"Also, when you have three players score in double figures, I don't think that a team is that tired,"

Rutherford said in a cynical tone.

Leah Honeycutt was the second-leading scorer for K-State with 13 points, and Diana Miller tossed in 12. For Missouri, Ericka Fields led the way with 23 points and Lisa Sandbothe added 16.

K-State was again outrebounded, this time by a 40-32 margin. Including the Missouri game, K-State has been outrebounded 155-102 over the last three games. That's an average of 51.6 rebounds for the opponents and 34 for the K-State women.

"Right now, I would say that we're not a bad rebounding team," Yow said. "When our team sees something wrong they will rectify it. It's just that our team hasn't recognized it yet."

Yow added the team hasn't peaked yet due to some areas that need work.

K-State travels to Norman, Okla., Wednesday to take on the University of Oklahoma Sooners.

Reunion time for reflecting

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Forty years of K-State basketball tradition were celebrated Friday and Saturday as members of the 1950-51 Wildcat team met in Manhattan for their fourth reunion.

The team has had a reunion every five years since 1981. The first one was in 1971.

The team had a record of 25 wins and 4 losses, a conference championship, a conference record of 11-1 and took K-State basketball to its farthest ever spot in postseason play — the NCAA championship game.

K-State lost to the University of Kentucky, 68-58, for a second-place finish in the national tournament.

The Associated Press ranked the team fourth nationally, and United Press International ranked the Wildcats third. Two of the team's members were All-America selections: Ernie Barrett and Dick Knostman.

Knostman, a two-time All-American, said that many things are still the same for K-State basketball, but he pointed out a few differences.

"The players are taller, and there's more of them," he said. "It seems a little more physical since today they can dunk and the rules are a little different."

Knostman also said the preseason is different because many teams play easier opponents to build up their win-loss record.

J. Kyle Wyatt/Staff
Jack Stone, Los Angeles; President Jon Wefald; Lew Hitch, Westmoreland; and Dick Knostman share stories at the 1950-51 men's basketball reunion Friday at the Manhattan Holidome.

"We played teams like Purdue, Iowa State and Indiana in our pre-season," Knostman said.

Most of the players agreed the integration of minorities into college basketball has increased the talent pool.

Ed Head, a 1949-51 player, said K-State has been and always will be a good team.

"I think Coach Altman is doing an outstanding job. Maybe he got caught in a backswing this year," he said.

Head said he thought the basketball team has excellent recruiting tools this year to bring in top players.

"Those players are going to want to come to Manhattan if they see they can get immediate playing time," he said. "There is no reason we can't bring in the big talents because K-State has a lot to offer."

Many of the 1950-51 players also agreed that the Big Eight is one of the strongest conferences today.

Dick Peck, a 1950-52 player, said the Big Eight is stronger as a conference than even the Big Ten because the Big Eight has four or five solid teams.

The 1950-51 team has more to boast about than its won-loss record. It had a graduation rate of 100 percent, and 50 percent of the team was drafted into the NBA.

In addition to the statistics, there is another reason this particular team was so special — the team comradery.

"There was a friendship developed and everyone was accepted just as they were," said Jack Stone, a 1949-51 player.

Stone said that players come from all over — from South Dakota to California — for these reunions.

"I think that is indicative of the tradition, and tradition is what K-State is all about," Stone said.

Victory

the Buffs' leading scorer, was silent heading into the game. Wise scored all 12 of his points in the final 6:38.

"We didn't seem to have any trouble getting the ball inside to Shaun," Harrington said. "I don't think either team defended the other's strengths very well."

Wise, who had only one assist, said the game plan was to go to Vandiver.

"I wasn't really looking to score that much," Wise said. "Points don't really matter."

Whatever the case, the 'Cats did their part in keeping the game close early. K-State dominated the boards in the first half with a 25-11 advantage, but hit only 36 percent from the field.

"We'd push the ball up the floor, and we were getting good shots," K-State coach Dana Altman said. "I had to believe that sooner or later they'd fall."

The wishful thinking paid off in the second half as the 'Cats hit 14-of-22 for 64 percent. It was a welcome change for K-State, which had hit just 45 percent from the field since defeating Wichita State on Jan. 7.

"In the second half, we shot the ball OK," Altman said.

A more emphatic term may have been used if the 'Cats hit free throws down the stretch. K-State improved on its season percentage by making 12-of-18 from the line, but five of the misses came in the last six minutes of the game.

The biggest miss, however, may have come from Buff point guard Billy Law. Law's bank shot and a foul by Wires cut K-State's lead 69-68 with 29.8 seconds to play.

After a K-State timeout, Law missed the free throw and 'Cat center John Rettiger grabbed the rebound. "(K-State) executed a little better at both ends when it really counted," Harrington said. "There were some key possessions where they really made some big plays."

One of those happened when K-State's Jean Derouillere rebounded his own missed shot and fed to Wires for a 10-footer in the lane with 1:04 remaining.

Law fouled Wires on the play, and the crowd of 13,351 — K-State's second largest this season — erupted.

Altman showed his appreciation for the fan support after the game by running in front of the student section and screaming "thank you" to the crowd.

"When Colorado would make a run, they pumped us back up," Altman said. "I thought the student body was the difference."

K-State, 11-8 and 1-5, has two more home games before a rematch at Colorado in nine days. The 'Cats play host to Oklahoma at 6:35 p.m. Tuesday, before finishing their homestand Saturday against Iowa State.

Tennis team routed in 1st weekend

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

A difficult lesson was given to the inexperienced tennis team that dropped all its matches in two days at Topeka this weekend.

The team entered the spring season with only two members possessing past regular-season experience, and was unsettled due to injuries.

Illinois and Arkansas swept the K-State lineup, claiming every match in the dual meets played Friday and Saturday. Fighting to end the shutout, the Wildcats managed to win two sets in play with Arkansas Saturday, but could not take even one set from Illinois.

"The score indicates how far we have to go to become competitive," Coach Steve Bietau said.

At No. 1 singles, Michele Riniker bounced back from a one-sided loss against Illinois to take her match with Joanne Varnum of Arkansas to three sets before losing 6-4, 5-7, 6-3.

"Michele made a noticeable improvement over her performance Friday," Bietau said. "She did a good job of fighting and kept herself in the match."

Suzanne Sim and Neili Wilcox were responsible for the other set claimed by the squad, extending their match with the Razorbacks' Rose Barakat and Amy Loghry to 6-2, 4-6, 6-2. Sim also competed at No. 3 singles and received praise from Bietau for her performance.

Though disappointed by the weekend's results, Bietau found a few bright spots in the team's performance and received a few encouraging surprises.

Freshman Rosemary Hunter, a recent addition to the squad, had been nursing an injured knee and was not expected to play. However, Hunter and Bietau decided the knee was ready to be tested, and the newcomer from Australia played two singles matches in the No. 6 position and a doubles match at No. 3.

Angie Gover, who manned the No. 4 singles spot in the fall, was questionable for the weekend with injuries to her foot and shoulder. Gover entered the lineup on Saturday, however, teaming with Riniker at No. 1 singles. Though Gover and Riniker dropped the match 6-2, 6-4, Bietau was encouraged that Gover was ready for a competitive match.

Kelly stars in Pro Bowl

HONOLULU (AP) — Jim Kelly had a better Sunday to finish off the 1990 NFL season.

The Buffalo Bills quarterback threw two touchdown passes, the second a 13-yarder to Ernest Givins of the Houston Oilers with 1:49 remaining, to give the AFC a 23-21 victory over the NFC in the Pro Bowl on Sunday.

Unlike last week's Super Bowl, Kelly was on the other side as a team failed to kick a game-winning field goal in the final seconds. Last week, it was Buffalo's Scott Norwood who failed on a 47-yarder as Buffalo lost to the New York Giants 20-19.

Sunday night, it was the NFC's Morten Andersen of New Orleans who failed to come through, when his 46-yarder was blocked with seven seconds to play by Miami's Jeff Cross.

Kansas City's Nick Lowery kicked three field goals for the AFC.

Controller at fault in jetliner accident

By the Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — An air traffic controller directed a USAir jetliner and a smaller, commuter plane onto the same airport runway, resulting in a crash that killed as many as 32 people, investigators said.

The National Transportation Safety Board released highlights Saturday night of about five minutes of conversation between the controller and pilots just before the crash Friday night at Los Angeles International Airport.

Safety board spokesman Jim Burnett said the taped, tower traffic showed USAir Flight 1493 twice asked the controller for permission to land and received no response.

About two minutes before the crash, a controller directed commuter Skywest Flight 5569 with 12 people aboard to enter Runway 24-Left for takeoff, and the tape had the same controller giving the USAir pilot permission to land on 24-Left.

Moments later, controllers acknowledged a collision and fire had occurred on the runway.

Burnett, who gave an oral account of the tapes, would not say whether the controller had erred.

Cult film following includes college students

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

"We want lips! We want lips!" chanted a group of students in the Union Ballroom as they anticipated the opening scene of "The Rocky Horror Picture Show."

In the first scene brightly colored singing lips fill the movie screen.

The Union Program Council's Kaleidoscope and Feature Films committees showed the 16-year-old movie at 9:30 p.m. and midnight Friday and Saturday.

The movie begins as Brad Majors (Barry Bostwick) and Janet Weiss (Susan Sarandon) watch two friends get married, said Greg Rosa, chairman of the Feature Films Committee and senior in marketing.

Brad then asks Janet to marry him, and they set out to visit a friend. However, their car gets a flat tire. They end up trapped in a castle where Dr. Frank N. Furter (Tim Curry) is the host of a party for people from the transsexual planet Transylvania, he said.

"It's a cult movie," Rosa said. "It has a cult following."

"The actual story line is stupid," he said, "but it's fun to mimic it and see how crazy you can get."

Throughout the week and before the shows, the committees made and sold 200 survival kits in the Union for 25 cents. Each kit included rice, a slice of toast, a playing card and newspaper, said Jennifer Allen, chairwoman of the UPC Kaleidoscope Committee and junior in fine arts.

The committees also provided lists of other props used for various situations in the movie, she said.

Julie Ball, senior in animal science and industry, who was attending the movie for the 33rd time, explained the significance of some of the props.

She said the crowd throws rice in the air during the wedding scene and throws toast when someone says he wants to propose a toast. The newspapers are used as an umbrella during scenes in which it is raining and lighters are used when someone says there is a light.

Ball said she attended all four shows and used a pound of rice each night.

John Renfro, junior in business administration, also came prepared. "I have a whole loaf of toasted bread, a bag of rice, newspapers and a lighter," he said. "The purpose of coming is to have a good time."

He has seen the movie 10 times, but he keeps coming back because the more you see it the better it gets since you learn more about it, he said.

Ball agreed that the only way to memorize the lines is to go see it a number of times.

"You pick them up as you go," she said. "I got new lines Friday night and that was the 30th time I had seen it."

People who expect a quiet movie should not go to this one, because the crowd is the fun part of the movie, Ball said. "It's a great way to let off steam."

Jason Brown, senior in speech and political science, had already seen it 57 times before the midnight show Saturday.

"It's a lot of fun," he said. "It's something to do at midnight in Kansas."

At midnight both Friday and Saturday nights, the committees held a costume contest, judged by the audience.

First prize was a pass for six Kaleidoscope or Feature films, two tickets to see comedian Don Reed and a movie poster. Second prize was a film pass, a Willie mug and a Kaleidoscope T-shirt, and third prize was a film pass, Allen said.

During most of the week before the shows, UPC sponsored a "Rocky Horror Picture Show" trivia contest on KSDB-FM 92 and gave away about 20 tickets to the movie, she said.

She said that committee members put a lot of work into showing the movies.

Along with Union staff, they spent several hours Friday afternoon laying down a tarpaulin to protect the floor, covering the north wall with plastic, setting up folding chairs and checking the equipment.

"It's a big project," she said.

About 20 people worked each night to prevent any problems from occurring, Allen said. Some of them checked bags and coats for alcohol, while others walked the aisles to keep an eye on the audience.

"It was a good experience for the committees because they had to work with a crowd," she said.

Team prepares market strategy

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Students on K-State's National Agricultural Marketing Association Marketing Team are gaining practical experience through their preparation for a national competition in New Orleans in April.

The N.A.M.A. competition involves about 30 university teams nationwide preparing full scale marketing plans for actual products that are not yet on the market.

Roger Long, senior in agronomy and president of the K-State N.A.M.A. chapter, said the 12-member team has been working since October to prepare their plan for a corn rootworm insecticide, an actual product that will be released by a major agri-chemical company in three to five years.

The team must develop a logo, company history and marketing plan for the product, which has been named "Anchor," Long said. Since the team first began meeting, most of their time has been spent doing background work.

"The biggest part has been going to the library and researching," said team member Gay Conley, senior in agricultural economics and finance.

Up to now, the team has met four to six hours a week working on their presentation. However, they will have to meet every day as the deadline approaches.

"It's a challenge and a lot of hard work, but it's worth it in the end," Conley said.

John Riley, assistant director of agriculture resident instruction and N.A.M.A. adviser and marketing team coach, said that each team spends so much time working together that they become pretty close. When alumni members come back to visit, the people they often want to know about are the ones they worked with on the team.

Teamwork is a big part of the project. Everybody has to do their part and do it well, Riley said.

Riley has been the adviser for the team since it began in 1981. Members have dubbed him the official worrier.

"I guess I see my role in several ways," he said. "One is a motivator. One is to provide them guidance. One of my big responsibilities is to question what they're doing, which in turn stimulates them to question their plan."

Riley also said that team members learn time management because they must meet deadlines and one part of the plan depends on the other.

They also gain new experiences, he said, since the conventions are held in large cities such as Dallas, Washington, St. Louis, Toronto and Chicago to accommodate over 1000 participants. He said a lot of the team members may fly for the first time or see their first big city, in addition to the benefits related to their career choice.

"They're dealing with a real-life situation. It's a tremendous case study," Riley said.

The team is currently working to put all their information in a five-page report due in March. The report constitutes 50 percent of their score in the first round of competition judging.

Riley said the first round of judging is done by three judges, who are professionals and members of N.A.M.A.

The teams are divided into five sections and the top two teams in

WSU cancels radio program

Producer proclaims audience is victim of censorship

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

The cancellation of an alternative music program in Wichita has raised censorship questions for a group of former employees and listeners.

Teri Mott, former employee of KMWU-FM 89.1, The Wichita State University radio station, said she believed she and her listeners were the victims of censorship.

Mott, coordinator of the Wichita Alternative Music Coalition, said the alternative music radio program she produced — After Midnight — was taken off the air because the administration felt her programming was dangerous and only had a small audience.

"But we had an enormous number of requests," she said. "And our pledge drives were very successful. We know they (the listeners) were out there."

Mott organized the WAMC in response to the cancellation of After Midnight because several people were concerned what it would do to the alternative music scene in Wichita.

The WAMC promotes alternative music concerts in the area and keeps people informed through its newsletter, "Rituals and Dogma," which is printed about every six weeks.

Alternative music consists of jazz, world beat, country-rock, industrial, garage bands, reggae, folk, psychedelic, hard-core, dance music, rap and hip-hop.

Gary Shivers, manager of KMWU, said the After Midnight program was cancelled because there wasn't a supervisor for the program's staff, and he didn't think there was adequate training available for the staff members.

"The music was not an issue," he said. "The type of training experience the university can offer was (the issue)."

"We were concerned about the quality of the educational experience at the station," he said. "At the same time, it is a professional environment, and the show had no supervisor for the staff."

Shivers said although he didn't believe the program had a measurable listenership, he did invite Mott to structure a new format for After Midnight that provided a professional environment for the students.

"I haven't heard back from her on that," Shivers said.

KMWU is much like K-State's radio station, KSDB. Both stations receive their licenses from the Federal Communications Commission through the universities. The universities have the right to change format or censor their programming. However, KMWU is a national public radio station and is not student operated, Shivers said.

"After Midnight followed FCC regulations," Mott argued. "The only complaints from listeners were about anti-family or anti-religious content of some songs."

"I would usually tell those people, 'Thank you for listening, there is a dial on your radio if you do not like the programming,'" she said.

Joe Montgomery, station manager at KSDB, said the University can oversee programming at KSDB. However, the administration takes a hands-off policy when it comes to the programming.

"We follow the FCC rules on indecency and obscenity," Montgomery said. "Airwaves belong to the public, and access to them is difficult to control. Because children have easy access to radio, you have to protect them from indecency."

Montgomery said there has only been one instance of the station experiencing outside censorship. Last year a listener complained about a song that had a racial slur, and the song was removed from programming. He also said the station always investigates if someone complains about a song.

KSDB has a general policy that it will not air programming that suggests violence towards women, racism, sexism or ethnic insensitivity, Montgomery added.

"It's much better if broadcasters make rules for themselves instead of waiting for the FCC to step in," Montgomery said.

Conference to help swine producers adapt

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

About 200 swine producers and faculty are pre-registered for K-State's Swine Profitability Conference on Tuesday, Feb. 5.

The conference is in its fifth year and is really designed to help swine producers evaluate business decisions," said Jim Nelssen, swine extension specialist.

K-State students are also invited and will not be charged to attend. Written copies of the session will be available for a small fee, Nelssen said.

The program begins at 9:30 a.m. in K-State Union's Forum Hall. Glenn Grimes, University of Missouri swine specialist, will speak on "The Changing Structure of the U.S. Swine Industry."

The program will include two

Kansas swine producers.

Craig Good, Olsburg, manages a small farrow-to-finish operation of 50 sows. He will talk about "How a Small Swine Producer Can Stay Competitive."

Then Ken Goodyear, swine producer from Dwight, will speak on "Adapting Techniques to Improve a Commercial Swine Production Business." Goodyear will represent the medium-to-large swine producer.

Although the size of production units in Kansas are diverse, Nelssen said farms are moving toward larger producing units. Tuesday's participants will probably own 100 to 150 sows.

After lunch, a Minnesota veterinarian, Ken Kislingbury, will discuss ways to keep swine production in the Midwest.

Agriculture education graduates in demand

SCOTT FOWLER
Collegian Reporter

In days of a really tough job market, there's good news for agricultural education graduates — they are in demand.

There are more teaching jobs available in the state of Kansas than graduates to fill them, said John Parmley, associate professor of secondary education.

Betty Moats, assistant director of career planning and placement, explained that K-State is the only university in the state to graduate agricultural education candidates.

Parmley said he didn't think the number of K-State graduates was going to meet the demand for agricultural education teaching positions in the state of Kansas this year.

He added, "One big problem is that not enough students are coming into the program to meet the demand, so potentially we are headed for problems."

Richard Welton, professor of agricultural education, said there has been an increased number of high school teaching positions available for agricultural education graduates in the last five years.

Also, the turn-over percentage for high school agricultural education teachers has increased in the last five years, Welton said.

In 1986, eight teaching positions were available and by 1989 that number increased to 23, he said.

During the early 1980s, Parmley said, the farm crisis diminished the job market.

Steven Harbtreit, assistant professor of adult and occupational education, explained that during the 1970s many agricultural education graduates went into agricultural business after teaching for a few years.

But, the farm crisis in the early '80s caused many agricultural businesses to cut these former teachers, so they re-entered the job market and were competing with K-State graduates for jobs in secondary education.

"But now there is a definite trend going the other way," Harbtreit said, "and there is a wonderful potential job market."

Parmley said now they are battling some misconceptions about the state of the potential job market.

He said, "The largest single group in agricultural education will go into teaching."

Welton said, however, many other options are available for agricultural education graduates because of their broad background.

This background, he said, includes a diversity of course study within the agricultural education department along with the student-teaching experience.

"The diversity makes the students more marketable," Welton said.

After graduation, some students will work in agricultural businesses that sell fertilizer or feed and animal health products, Welton said.

He said other agricultural education graduates decide to pursue agricultural finance. These students might work at places such as the Farm Credit Services and Farm and Home Administration.

Parmley said, "Some agricultural education graduates will begin teaching at the community college level and at the same time will start immediately on a master's degree."

Personnel development positions in agricultural business, farming and ranching and cooperative extension programs for local, county and state are other careers agricultural education students choose, Parmley said.

But some students don't stop with an agricultural education degree.

"There is an increasing number of students who are also certifying in a

Teams

each section advance to the next round, which is judged by seven or eight judges.

The final 10 teams are divided into two groups, and the top two in each advance to the final round of competition, which is judged by 15 judges. The first and second place teams will make their presentations to the entire convention.

The K-State chapter has been very successful in the competition. In 1989 and 1990, the team made it into the semifinals, and took first place in 1988 and 1983. In 1986, the team placed second.

The winning products have come from a wide variety of areas. The only restriction on the selection of the product is that it must be an agriculture-related product not currently on the market.

Last year's winning presentation was on seedless watermelons. Other K-State entries have included a grain elevator monitoring system, sausage links and a soybean herbicide. Other schools have done plans for carbonated flavored milk, California wine and a single serving package of cottage cheese.

Students are only a small part of the N.A.M.A. organization, which has a nationwide membership of over 2500 professionals, 800 to 1000 of which attend the event with 300 to 400 students. The convention is also a forum for company presentations, a trade show, a careers fair for students and media presentations.

K-State's chapter works with the professional chapter in Kansas City on various projects. They receive assistance for the marketing competition in the form of information and research data as well as some financial aid.

The chapter is also involved in a mentoring program with the professional chapter. Interested members are paired with a professional and spend at least a day on the job learning what the real world is like. Students can also get help with resume writing and make job contacts.

The marketing team is only one of the reasons the K-State chapter has gained nationwide recognition. Last year, the traveling trophy for the outstanding chapter was retired to K-State, because the chapter had either won it or placed since the chapter began in 1981.

The award is based on chapter activities, which at K-State include an interview clinic, the mentor program, a rookie scholarship for new members, work with Open House and the Agri-Business Careers Fair, a brochure for Cattlemen's Day and assistance with the KJLS Trade Show.

Any K-State student is eligible to be on the marketing team, which is listed as a class to receive up to two hours of college credit a year. The only requirement is membership in the N.A.M.A. organization.

The K-State chapter has about 40 members, mostly from the college of agriculture. However, the majors represented range from agricultural economics to animal sciences and industry to agriculture journalism to agronomy.

second teaching field which is almost exclusively biology," Welton said.

"There is a definite trend toward teaching more agricultural science in high school agricultural education programs throughout the state," he added. "As a matter of fact, about half the 160 high schools with a agricultural education program include a course in agricultural science."

Also, in Kansas 61 of the 168 agricultural teachers are certified to teach science, and an additional 53 are pursuing science certification, he said.

Welton said he expects 12 K-State agricultural education students to graduate this spring, and according to the selected placement data of the program, there were 16 high school positions open for agriculture teachers.

service, it will be passed onto the consumer in the form of higher prices. These are the things that would affect everyone, everyday."

Rep. Steve Lloyd, R-Clay Center, found some humor in the new tax proposals.

"They are going to tax us to die," he said. "There is a proposed tax on crematoriums and funeral homes. And that's indicative of the new pay-as-you-go plan."

Kerr said the property relief issue will be a first priority in the Legislature.

"Lower- and middle-income people will pay the most for it, and higher income people will tend to get more relief because they own more land," Kerr said. "We are trying to evaluate the plan from a fairness standpoint."

"To change classifications, it takes a constitutional change with a difficult two-thirds vote to pass," he said.

Kerr said there is better than a 50 percent chance it will pass.

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, defended Finney as the only Democrat sitting on the panel.

"Everyone has something bad to say about (the Finney proposal)," she said. "Finney has made it clear that she is fairly flexible regarding the proposals she put forth. Her priority is for there to be $500 million of tax relief. She is not wedded to getting it by the way she has set forth."

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said the governor's 112 proposed new taxes raise questions in themselves.

"These are not tax shifts nor loopholes," he said. "These are new taxes that everyone will pay. Once you add them, you don't subtract. That's government math."

Brake said eventually his goal is to have a circulation of 4,000 readers and a 32-page paper, as compared to his current 16-page one.

"This is definitely the smallest paper I've ever worked for," Brake said, "and I know I'll never get rich at it, but I love it and I think the paper's going to make it."

So far now, Brake said he is happy working until late into the night, pasting down the last ad late Wednesday night, turning the pages into Ag Press by 8 a.m. Thursday to be printed, rolling the papers when he gets them from the printer two hours later, then delivering them — with the help of family and friends.

And he said he has fun every step of the way.

Alksnis forcing Soviet choice

Gorbachev could roll back reforms

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Viktor Alksnis says he's just a regular guy, but Soviet reformers call him one of the colonels who is forcing Mikhail Gorbachev to roll back reforms or face a bloody civil war.

"The conflict could start at any moment," Alksnis said in an interview. "The situation in hot spots of the Soviet Union is so bad that spontaneous military action might take place there."

Forgoing his blue air force stripes, Alksnis wore a black leather jacket and badges identifying him as a member of the Soviet and Latvian legislatures.

Lounging in his suite at the Moscow Hotel near the Kremlin, the tall, beefy 40-year-old radar engineer seemed an unlikely candidate to lead the reaction against Gorbachev's reforms. Alksnis' grandfather, a three-star general in the Red Army, was shot as a traitor by dictator Josef Stalin.

Alksnis says he has three political goals: a state based on laws rather than power, an economy based on market forces rather than central planning along the Stalinist model, and a voluntary rather than a forced federation of the 15 Soviet republics.

Such apparent hard-liners as Alksnis adopt the form if not the substance of perestroika: democracy and greater openness.

"Call me Viktor," a jovial Alksnis said. He began the interview by proclaiming, "I'm just a regular guy."

The same Alksnis accuses Gorbachev of betraying army officers who responded to a call from the shadowy Lithuanian National Salvation Committee and attacked a Lithuanian television tower Jan. 13. Thirteen civilians and one soldier were killed in the attack, the goriest chapter in the crackdown on the Baltics.

The Soviet president has denied advance knowledge of the attack in Lithuania and separate incidents that have claimed five lives in neighboring Latvia. Alksnis said, "Gorbachev must have been informed."

Alksnis said Gorbachev sanctioned creation of the National Salvation Committees in the Baltics, intending them to rival elected legislatures.

Gorbachev "wanted to establish dual power in Lithuania and Latvia, and to make the Supreme Soviet (legislatures) and the committees equal, and then to dethrone both and proclaim presidential rule in the republics," said Alksnis.

Internships assist students in future

CANDY MCNICKLE
Collegian Reporter

The question of what kind of job they will have after graduating concerns many students. One way to prepare for employment is by interning at a company, business, service or agency.

A student can acquire an internship with the help of a faculty member or department head, or by writing a company.

Linda Puntney, assistant director of Student Publications Inc. and assistant professor of journalism, said the journalism department is very supportive in helping students with their internships.

"We can give the student a list of people who are hiring, but it is up to the student to get their own internship by going through us or going straight through the company," Puntney said.

"Acquiring an internship is just like applying for a job because students will send the company a resume and examples of their work. Out of 52 interns that were eligible for hire, 80 percent were hired. Many of the agencies were very pleased with our interns because of their Mac lab and other skills," Puntney said.

Each department in the University has its own structure to aid students in finding internships or encourages its students to go through the Career Planning and Placement Center.

Jim Akin, the center's director, said the program is a very active one.

"We work with the departments, and some companies interview on campus for summer employment and internships. We have various directories and bulletins the students can use," Akin said.

"Our turnout for employment has been pretty successful. Many companies are interested in hiring interns full-time. It's fun when three or four companies want to employ the same student," Akin said.

"I feel there is no substitute for the experience gained through an internship. Students should have at least one, if not more, job-related internships or summer jobs that will help them in the job market."

The center provides one-on-one help, said Carla Shull, graduate student in psychology.

"I get information from employers and create a filing system. I create bulletins for the students and also talk to them about other available sources we have to help them in finding summer employment," said Shull.

"The only problem with this is that we get very poor feedback from the students on whether or not they got an internship. In the future we are going to survey the students or try to catch them around senior orientation time so we know how they did," Shull said.

"Companies and businesses go through (the College of) Arts and Sciences looking for business or arts and sciences students," said Roger Trenary, economics instructor. "Economic students are considered arts and sciences students, so they may get hired. The process is the same as looking for a job because the students fill out a data sheet."

David Kappelman, senior in bakery science management, went through the Department of Grain Science and Industry in early February 1990. He said he found a list of companies to contact and did the rest on his own.

"I had the option of doing my last internship as a class but didn't. The information I worked with was considered confidential so I couldn't report to anyone when it was over," Kappelman said. "My internships were great experiences and I recommend that anyone interested in doing an internship look into it."

Ambassadors for College of Business send letters to businesses and companies and then post the names of interested companies on a bulletin board. Students pick out the ones they are interested in and set up interviews with the company on their own.

"Students get academic credit for their internships, which have proven to be very successful," said Fred Rice, director of the Small Business Development Center. "Students gain knowledge on three things — resume information, possible hiring by companies, and learning what they want in a company."

A practicum is what the foods and nutrition department uses in place of an internship. Jane Bowers, head of the Department of Foods and Nutrition, said there are two- to three faculty who supervise the students in getting their practicum.

"Students get a list of available ideas and sign an objective agreement with the company," Bowers said.

Manhattan Fire Department firetruck driver Dirk Cott, of Manhattan, removes rescue equipment from the mangled front of a car that wrecked into a bridge west of Manhattan on Anderson Avenue and Silver Creek Road Monday afternoon.

CANDY MCNICKLE
Collegian Reporter

One person was injured in a one-vehicle accident west of Manhattan on Anderson Avenue and Silver Creek Road Monday. Jesse R. Pendon Jr., of 3124 Lundin Drive, Manhattan, was the driver of a 1989 Chevrolet Cavalier station wagon that crashed into a bridge less than a quarter mile east of Silver Creek Road at about 4:35 p.m.

Officer Bill Schuck said the accident was reported by Richard Sallee, of 3418 Silver Creek Road. Pendon said he was on his way back home from Concordia when he apparently fell asleep at the wheel.

Rescuers used the Jaws of Life to gain entry into the vehicle. Pendon was then taken to Manhattan's Memorial Hospital by the Riley County Ambulance.

"The driver was conscious upon arrival, but his seat belt is what saved his life," Schuck said.

Schuck was unable to give an estimate on damages to the bridge, but the car was considered to be totaled.

"The front end of the car was completely totaled along with the under-carriage. The roof was ripped from the front to the back," he said.

The bridge was owned by the State of Kansas and suffered only minor damage.

"The bridge had a concrete rail to keep vehicles from going over it," Schuck said. "Pendon hit the bridge from the east and knocked some cement off, but only minor repairs will be needed."

Administrations agree on merger

K-State, KCT may combine at $12.1 million cost

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

Kansas State University — Salina, College of Technology is on its way to becoming part of Salina and part of K-State.

The proposed merger of Kansas College of Technology with K-State has been in the works since October 1989, when the Kansas Board of Regents established a task force to make recommendations regarding the future of KCT.

The task force reported in May that the Salina school could no longer operate as an independent institution. The inability to attract a sufficient number of students was cited as the main reason.

The regents chose K-State over Pittsburg State and Wichita State University for several reasons.

In a Collegian article in June 1990 Regent Donald Slawson, chairman of the task force, said the K-State name would help recruitment both in the state and across the nation.

He also said the proximity of the campuses, the ability to combine resources of the two schools and the large number of K-State students from Salina played important roles in the final decision.

The total cost of the merger is to be $12.1 million. Proposed funding can be broken down into five areas:

■ KSU Foundation will put up $2 million for scholarships.

■ Revenue bonds and dorm fees will raise $2.6 million to build the residence hall.

■ The state of Kansas will put $2 million up front for the aeronautical center, or the Salina Airport Authority will build it and enter into a lease-purchase agreement with the state.

■ Money from the sale of south KCT campus will raise $1 million for capitol improvements, equipment and scholarships.

■ Proceeds from a temporary one-half cent sales tax in Salina will raise $4.5 million for other capitol improvements, including a student center and cafeteria.

Both administrations have supported the recommendation of the regents.

"There really has been no major opposition," said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. "Aside from a few

State Senate Education Committee to review merger funding proposals

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

The State Senate Education Committee will hear arguments at 1:30 p.m. Wednesday about the proposed merger of Kansas College of Technology in Salina and K-State.

The committee will decide whether or not to pass enabling legislation that would allow months of planning to become reality.

Thursday, the State Joint Building Committee will review proposals for the funding of the merger. They will then make a recommendation to the full Legislature.

One phase of improvements includes building an aeronautical center for a proposed cost of $2 million. The money will come from the state up front, or the Salina Airport Authority will build the center and then enter into a lease-purchase agreement with the state.

Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement, said he anticipates the second option to be approved.

"I just hope the legislation passes quickly," he said. "The sooner the better. We are in a kind of transition, waiting to get the ball rolling."

Chairman of both committees, Sen. Joseph Harder, R-Moundridge, said he didn't expect any decisions to be made after the first hearings.

"I would guess that action will be taken sometime next week," he said. "We are still looking for some information we don't have yet."

The proposed merger stems from a six-month study regarding the future of Kansas College of Technology done by a Kansas Board of Regents task force. The task force recommended a merger of KCT and K-State.

Israel will not retaliate without U.S. assistance

By the Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said Monday that Israel is suffering from its restraint in the Persian Gulf War but will not retaliate against Iraq without coordinating with the United States.

Shamir left open the option of retaliating for Iraqi missile attacks. He told parliament that an end will come for Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Defense Minister Moshe Arens told Palestinian leaders he was willing to take steps to ease a curfew that has been in effect in the occupied territories since the war began.

Iraq has fired about 30 Scud missiles at Israel, killing two civilians and wounding 270 others. Israel has not retaliated, partly because such a step could destabilize the U.S.-led anti-Iraqi front, which includes Arab countries.

"Our contending with this, and our lack of active participation in defending the country, is causing us suffering, because it is contrary to our principles," Shamir said in his speech.

"The time for us to take direct action against the Iraqi enemy will come when we ourselves make a decision to this effect in accordance with circumstances," he said.

Shamir added that Israeli retaliation would require an appropriate process of consultations with the United States.

"Facing his demonic missiles, in our sealed rooms, men, women and children ... we all feel the common heartbeat that pulses within us all, our determination to survive, our love for our homeland ... and knowledge that an end will come for the tyrant who has arisen."

Shamir praised a great effort by the United States to eliminate Iraqi missile launchers and noted the U.S. airlift of Patriot anti-missile missiles had helped to defend the country.

By a vote of 66-42, with eight abstentions, the parliament approved a resolution by Shamir's right-wing Likud bloc. It praised the government's restraint and stated that the destruction of the Iraqi war machine is vital for peace of the region.

Arens, the defense minister, appeared on Israeli television and acknowledged that Palestinians are truly going through terrible suffering during the war.

Arens said he was consulting mayors of West Bank and Gaza cities so that they will take partial responsibility for lifting the curfew.

The meeting came amid increasing calls for the government to lift the curfew, which has confined 1.7 million Palestinians to their homes except for a few hours a week when they are allowed out to shop.

"We have eased the curfews. We are allowing the population to work in their areas in agriculture and factories," Arens said. "We are considering letting workers enter Israel in a controlled way."

Enrollment to predict future parking

Permit prices vary, meters to be added

JODELL LAMER
Collegian Reporter

Future changes in the parking system at K-State will depend on the level of student enrollment, said Lt. Robert Mellgren of the K-State Police Department.

Currently K-State has one of the lowest student parking permit prices in the Big Eight. A student parking permit costs $20 per semester, a price set by the Kansas Board of Regents.

The University of Colorado charges as much as $56 per semester to park on campus. The lowest priced permit costs $23 and is for unpaired lots away from central campus.

"The price of the permit depends on the closeness of the lot to their school," said Martha Williams, parking management office supervisor.

"The law school has parking right outside the building available with the $56 permit," she said. "The College of Arts and Sciences has no lots close to the school, with the closest parking lot being three to four blocks away."

Williams said 3,500 student permits are sold each semester.

Parking lots at the University of Oklahoma are scattered and centrally

Big Eight parking fees

Although many K-State students complain about the lack of parking spaces on campus, K-State has one of the lowest costs of its parking permit. Some schools offer shuttle services to offset lack of parking.

located. A student permit costs $53 per year which includes the summer semester.

"A free parking lot with a shuttle bus is located two miles south of campus," said Sarah Blouch, manager of parking and transit at Oklahoma.

Blouch said that 3,737 commuter and 1,839 residence hall permits had been sold by the end of October.

Iowa State University also has a free shuttle service, according to Wilma Conard, supervisor of enforcement and appeals.

"The shuttle operates from Iowa State Center, which is near the football field," she said.

Conard said parking on campus lots required students to walk 10-15 minutes to reach class buildings.

"Student permits cost $20 per semester for commuters and $18 per semester for residence halls," she said.

A student parking permit at the University of Kansas costs $30 per semester for commuters and $20 for dorm residents.

At K-State the revenue generated by the sale of permits and collected from parking fines is used to maintain parking facilities.

Students purchase a parking permit, which allows them to park in a designated lot or lots.

Mellgren said the installation of parking meters at K-State is working better than expected.

"We will see more meters in the future because of that," he said.

Mellgren said he sees pros and cons on all sides of new parking issues. He used the possibility of a new shuttle system at K-State as an example, saying that it will not satisfy everyone.

He said any possible future parking lots will have to be constructed on the north side of campus, which creates a problem with walking distances.

Mellgren said current problems are not with a lack of parking, but instead a lack of convenient parking.

"A lack of convenient parking causes people to complain," he said.

"It's going to be hard to satisfy people without a shuttle system or building a parking garage."

Council to sponsor Mardi Gras events

LISA NOLL
Collegian Reporter

Prize giveaways, comedians and movies are just a few events planned for a Mardi Gras this week in the K-State Union.

The Union Program Council is sponsoring "Late Night Mardi Gras at the K-State Union," through Feb. 8.

Jeni Cardin, program adviser for UPC, said UPC wanted to keep with the theme for the New Orleans Mardi Gras. UPC sponsors special week-long events for students each year.

Free prizes will be given away at the Mardi Gras Prize Hunt in the Union. Students need to look for Mardi Gras doubloons which will be hidden throughout the Union.

About 50 coins will be placed in the Union daily, Cardin said. Students can redeem the coins for prizes like T-shirts, food and movie passes.

Comedian Don Reed will perform at 8 p.m. Feb. 8 in the Union Station. Reed has appeared on the "Cosby Show," HBO, Showtime and "A Different World." Tickets will be $2 for students.

Cardin said UPC wanted to provide entertainment and activities other than studying for the students.

"It gives them a break and gives them a reward," she said.

Art exhibits and sales will also be emphasized during the week.

"One display titled, 'Drawing USA,' is an invitational drawing exhibition," said Russ Perez, program adviser for UPC.

One drawing from each of the 50 states was picked and will be shown in the Union Art Gallery.

There will also be an exclusive art print sale on the first floor of the Union. The print prices range from 75 cents to $35 so they are very affordable for students, Perez said.

Students can be entertained each day at noon in the Union Courtyard. Performers will include a singer/songwriter, an acappella do-wop group and the KSU Jazz Combo.

Special movie presentations will also be shown during the week in Forum Hall and the Union Little Theatre.

Bombs near naval base disarmed

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) — Six pipe bombs found fastened Monday to two chemical tanks near the world's largest naval base were safely disarmed or detonated, military officials said.

One square-mile area was evacuated after the first two bombs, attached to a tank containing flammable methanol, were discovered. The other four bombs were attached to a tank containing a less dangerous chemical.

The tanks are at Allied Terminals Inc. on the Elizabeth River. The site is about 10 miles from the sprawling Norfolk Naval Base, and five miles from the Navy's Craney Island fuel depot.

No one immediately claimed responsibility for the bombs. Base security had been tightened in the wake of Iraqi threats to commit terrorism because of the war in the Mideast.

An Allied Terminals employee found the first two bombs attached to a one million-gallon tank of methanol, a highly volatile and flammable chemical used as a fuel, solvent and antifreeze.

Those bombs were successfully disarmed and removed, said Bob Jasinski, a state police special agent.

FBI agent sentenced for espionage

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The only FBI agent ever convicted of espionage was sentenced to 20 years in prison Monday by a judge who suggested the agency shouldn't have placed such an inept agent in control of sensitive documents.

It should have been obvious that Richard Miller was highly susceptible to recruitment as a spy, said U.S. District Judge Robert Takasugi.

Takasugi imposed separate sentences ranging from 10 years to 20 years on the six counts of Miller's indictment, but he ordered all of the sentences to run concurrently. He said Miller would be eligible for parole after serving one-third of the 20 years.

The sentence was far lighter than Takasugi could have chosen. A judge in an earlier trial on the same charges sentenced Miller to two consecutive life terms plus 50 years. The conviction was overturned on appeal.

Suspects sought in eagle slaughter

TULSA (AP) — Authorities vowed Monday to prosecute those responsible for the slaughter of at least 14 bald eagles in Osage County.

A federal prosecutor said the slaughter was a horrible act. Cowboys inspecting fence just north of Pawhuska, Okla., last week found four carcasses with the feet and tails missing. All of the eagles had been shot.

A state game ranger videotaping the scene later found 28 feet, most with two claws missing.

U.S. Attorney Tony Graham said it was unclear how many eagles had been slaughtered, but he said it represented the largest number of single killings of bald eagles in Oklahoma history.

Bald eagles are protected by the Federal Endangered Species Act. Maximum penalties for killing bald eagles are two years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Leaders cautious about tax plan

TOPEKA (AP) — Two Democratic House leaders remained cautious Monday about Gov. Joan Finney's massive property tax relief plan.

Their comments came a day before the House Taxation Committee was scheduled to begin hearings on two proposed amendments to the state constitution's property taxation provisions.

Rep. George Teagarden of LaCygne, the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, acknowledged that the Legislature will have to approve a large relief plan for property owners to see a difference in their tax bills. He said he thinks the tax crisis may be isolated to a few areas of the state.

House Speaker Marvin Barkis of Louisburg praised Finney for proposing a courageous tax plan, saying it would reverse 50 years of special interest tax policy. He was also careful to say that he was not endorsing Finney's entire plan.

Barkis also publicly urged special interest groups to propose their own property tax relief plans instead of merely criticizing the governor's package.

"Gov. Joan Finney has proposed a bold legislative package," Barkis said.

Convicted man requests new trial

TOPEKA — (AP) Attorneys asked a judge Monday to grant a new trial to former American Indian Movement leader Leonard Peltier.

They contended that his 1977 conviction in the slaying of two federal agents resulted from tainted evidence and a campaign of intimidation by the FBI.

Outside the courtroom, William Kunstler, one of four lawyers who represented Peltier at a habeas corpus hearing before U.S. District Court Judge Richard Rogers, called the Peltier case a failure of American justice.

Peltier, 46, was convicted by a jury in Fargo, N.D., of the slayings in June 1975 of two FBI agents on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. He is serving two consecutive life sentences at the federal prison in Leavenworth.

Peltier, who was the only witness to testify during Monday's hearing, has been imprisoned since Feb. 6, 1976.

Peltier said his trial first was scheduled for Cedar Rapids, Iowa, then mysteriously moved to Fargo.

Cheerleader wanna-be gets caught

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. (AP) — A 26-year-old man who enrolled in a high school as a girl and made the all-girl cheerleading squad was sentenced Monday to two years' probation.

El Paso County District Judge Richard Hall said Charles Daugherty must continue counseling and stay out of trouble with the law as conditions of that probation.

Daugherty had been diagnosed earlier as having multiple personalities. He told Hall at one hearing that he wants to get a high school diploma and become a psychologist.

Daugherty pleaded guilty on Jan. 3 to criminal impersonation and could have been sentenced to up to two years in jail.

He enrolled at Coronado High School on Sept. 6 as a junior under the name Cheyen Weatherly.

The ruse was detected eight days later after school officials became suspicious and began checking his records. Daugherty had claimed to be a transfer student from Greece, and he had given school officials computer records that were proved to be false.

"He had a lot of makeup on. It looked like it was plastered. He had makeup where his beard would be," a 16-year-old classmate said at the time.

Former member to sing in Union

By the Collegian Staff

Janet McLaughlin, former member of the musical group Indigo Girls, will be performing at noon in the K-State Union Station on Feb. 5.

The Indigo Girls is a popular group that has recorded albums such as "Hitchhiker Exemplar," "Nomads Indian Saints," "Strange Fire," "Indigo Girls" and "Theodore: An Alternative Music Sampler."

McLaughlin, guitarist and singer, was chosen to perform by the UPC board after they saw her act at the National Association for Campus Activities regional conference in Wichita.

The NACA gathers entertainers to perform for college representatives. The entertainers then hope to get booked to perform at these colleges.

Raelyn Clark, senior in industrial engineering and UPC eclectic entertainment chairwoman, said she enjoyed McLaughlin's performance at NACA.

"She's an excellent performer and a great singer. We thought the campus would really like her," she said.

Amy Hoch, junior in business administration and UPC special events chairwoman, also has seen McLaughlin perform.

"I really liked her," Hoch said. "She was warm, funny and had good stage presence."

McLaughlin performs pop-folk music, which includes some Indigo Girls songs, and her act has won campus entertainment awards, Hoch said.

"The students are really lucky to get this act at K-State," she said. "I think people would be missing out if they did not go."

McLaughlin is not the only entertainer from NACA scheduled to perform in the Union this semester. Russ Perez, adviser for UPC, said Bertice Berry, a comedian, is coming in March and a band, Holiday Ranch, is performing in April.

Jamie Raymond, senior in chemistry education, reaches during morning aerobics Monday at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Hours added for aerobics

Morning sessions add variety

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

At 6:30 a.m. many might be sleeping, but not the early bird. The early bird is doing aerobics at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Joyce Halverson, assistant director of recreational services, said morning aerobics has been around since the fall of 1983, when a graduate student came up with the idea.

In fact morning aerobics is older than the afternoon sessions at 4:30 and 5:30.

"In 1984 we started a Jane Fonda aerobics class at 4:30 p.m. It really took off," Halverson said.

Because of good response, Halverson said the hours were expanded for morning aerobics. This is the first semester it has been offered five days a week.

"Many people make aerobics a regular part of their day," Halverson said. "All kinds of people have different needs and for many the morning session works best for them."

Theresa Rottinghaus, senior in speech pathology, is one of the instructors. She teaches Tuesday and Thursday mornings.

Rottinghaus has been an instructor at the Rec Complex for about two years. She said she wouldn't know what to do without aerobics.

"I love it. It's the best way to start the day, and it makes it easier to start out in the morning," she said.

MIKE WELCH/HANS/Staff
Many students get out of bed long before campus classes begin to attend aerobics classes at 6:30 a.m.

Rottinghaus said an average of 20 people come on the days she teaches it. She has, however, had as many as 60.

"Everyone seems really dedicated. I have my regulars who come every-time," she said.

Kim Allen, senior in social work and human development, said she goes about twice a week in the mornings because it is more convenient.

Allen has been devoted to aerobics ever since she lived with Rottinghaus her sophomore year.

"It all started when Theresa and I lived together and she would drag me out of bed," Allen said.

Eventually Allen got hooked and has been going regularly ever since.

"It really gets you energized for the day," she said.

Machines teach contemporary lessons

I think the problem with our society today is that we just don't get enough opportunity for revenge. This is not the column that I had planned for today. This is the product of my deep anger against this computer, which, for some unexplained reason, ate my column for today. Ate it all up. Left half of one sentence. So, needless to say, I'm irritated. This has happened to me several times before, under a variety of circumstances. I always end up hugely irritated and left with nothing to take it out on except hapless humans in the near vicinity. I expect I'll end up with an ulcer eventually.

I've concluded mechanical things are conspiring to put an end to the entire human race by driving us all into massive stress-related heart attacks. The worst part of it is there's absolutely nothing we can do. I would love to smash this computer into tiny bits and pieces, but I can't afford to replace it, and I need it. I need more than it needs me, and it knows it.

I need revenge. I need to be able to annoy the things that annoy me. In a mechanical society we are denied that basic, primitive right. We can't club them, poison them or give them the plague. They can't be strangled. They have no pet peeves that you can begin to practice. Leaving dirty underwear in the bathroom doesn't bother mechanical things a bit. I need to hunt them down and do to them what they've done to me. John Wayne would, no doubt, have figured out a way.

Telephones are the absolute worst of the variety of modern conveniences that fill my home. I hate them. I can't get rid of it, because I might need it in an emergency. So I get my revenge, such as it is, by not answering it. That works fine, now that we've got an answering machine. I just ignore it, and if people don't care enough to leave a message, then I don't want to talk to them. Whether or not my roommates want to talk to them may be a different story, but they're not home — so they have no rights in this respect.

Before we got our answering machine, I just laid on the couch and stared at the phone. A lot of people say they can't do this, but I find that after you've gotten up to answer it four times in the past 15 minutes, and it's been for the same person that wasn't you all four times, and all four people have wanted to leave really complicated messages, it becomes very easy to ignore the phone.

So I was ignoring it one wet day, and it rang and rang and rang. Finally I got up to answer it, but the person (you guessed it) hung up. I cuddled up on the couch and dozed off,

Karin
Dell'Antonia

Collegian Columnist

enjoying the patter of the rain on the window. About 10 minutes later, one of my roommates marched in, soaked. "You'd better not have been lying there and watching the phone ring," she said.

I admit it; I lied. I lied through my teeth. If we didn't have a stupid phone, I wouldn't have been in that position.

I normally don't mind using the phone myself. I don't even mind talking to answering machines. In some ways it's easier, because they don't argue or want to chat. It's the modern answer to the soliloquy.

I hate calling places where the phone automatically answers you and puts you on hold. I mean, what if I were being chased by hoards of murderers or something, and I reached a phone and dialed a number, ready to scream out my location and a plea for help ... and I got a machine. Telling me that there were people there but I'd have to wait for one, or dial an extension after listening to a huge spiel of instructions. So there I'd be, dead, listening to the Muzak version of "You Light Up My Life." Hey, it may be an unlikely scenario, but it's a possibility.

This reminds me of an almost totally unrelated question. Have you ever dialed 911? I have, fortunately not during a major emergency, and it took them about a week to answer. I've always pictured myself dialing it and screaming out an address while the house burned around me or the burglars pounded on the door ... but by the time they answered the phone, I would have been toast. Oh, well, one more thing to worry about. Back to my column.

The worst thing about these automatic phone things is that you can't argue. You can't say that you don't want to be on hold, or you just had a quick question, or wait, you don't have a push-button phone. All you can do is wait and eventually start wondering if there's really anyone there. The airlines do this the best. They play soothing music and whisper subliminal things like "fly our new semi-automatic coach class" and "frequent fliers have more fun." Occasionally, they suggest that you try another number, where you will be put on hold for even longer. This is a trick to see if you really want to talk to them, or if you're a wimp who prefers two birds in the bush to one in the hand.

I'd be a healthier person, mentally, if there was some way I could revenge myself on all the computers, phones, bank machines and cars that have done me wrong over the years. I don't want to smash them. I just want to cause them problems. I want to eat their only source of funds or energy or whatever at midnight in a strange town. I want to strand them on I-70 between Salina and Russell. I want to chow down on page after page of hard work they didn't remember to save regularly. I want to put them on hold, and I want them to know it.

Most of all, though, I want my other column back. As I tossed my notes in the trash after writing it, I had a premonition ... something told me I'd regret it. But no, I thought, it's all in my friend the terminal, and it won't let me down.

Another exciting lesson learned at K-State.

K-State basketball teams deserve support of fans

Now that the Super Bowl has come and gone, we can finally kiss football good-bye and focus our hungry eyes on basketball.

Wildcat basketball to be more exact.

Recent success by the K-State football squad has resulted in more fans enjoying a fall afternoon in KSU Stadium and at the same time may have forced a few fans out of Bramlage Coliseum.

This year alone attendance at K-State men's basketball games has averaged 9,709 in the 13,500-seat arena. The attendance at Lady Cat games has been less than 10 percent of that, averaging about 930.

The lack of fan support can be seen not only in the empty seats, but in the teams' records as well. The Wildcats began the Big Eight season with one of their worst starts ever.

But just when the road ahead looked bleak and narrow, along came a group of Jay-hawks from down the trail to spark a dying fire.

The K-State-KU game was a sell-out and the coliseum almost sounded like a bellowing Ahearn Field House at times. The game chalked up a scratch in the loss column but revived some purple pride.

Last Saturday, a prime opportunity sat facing Wildcat fans, and the call was answered only in part.

The fans again filled-up the "Kitty-Dome" and with a little mustering, kept the Colorado Buffaloes from ending their 54-game Big Eight road losing streak with a little noise and a few thousand waving arms.

But, that piece of victory was only half the cake.

The Lady Cats hosted Missouri not more than an hour after the men's game was finished. The fans were invited to stay and enjoy a complete afternoon of basketball action.

A few daring fans who braved the devastating effects of bleacher buns stayed put and enjoyed another Big Eight battle.

The Missouri game was another in a series of last-minute victories for the Lady Cats, filled with action and great plays in a stadium filled with empty seats.

Get out and support the Lady Cats and the great basketball they have been playing. Continue to support the 'Cats and help cheer them out of the Big Eight cellar tonight when they face Oklahoma in Bramlage.

Concerts rock Manhattan

With the recent rise of Manhattan, and more accurately Bramlage Coliseum, to the forefront of rock concert venues, I find myself excited. In the last three months alone, we've had AC/DC, Poison and a couple of opening acts no one remembers. Soon, Bad Company and Damn Yankees will turn the arena floor into a "bone-crushing, mind-jarring flame thrower." The way things are going, we might even get to see a band who doesn't find it necessary to wear leather.

The local scene is no less exciting. Bands such as Roach Factory and The Moving Van Goghs allow everyone in Manhattan to say "I know a guy that plays in the band." Knowing someone in a band is very important as it allows you, through some form of osmosis, to take credit for the music being played on stage. Kind of like a fifth Beatle. Or C.R.E.E.P.

Alas, most things come to an end, and should a band ever break up it's very important to follow some important guidelines. First, make sure that you see the band's last performance. Then years from now you can say stuff like "I saw their last concert, man. They rocked." Secondly, make sure the act breaking up is or was "the greatest band ever." Using phrases like this will make your friends think that you are "hip," rather than a drugged-out social reject who has nothing better to do than follow bands around.

Alas, I can hear some of you now saying "Shawn Bruce, what makes you such an expert on rock 'n' roll?" I can hear others asking "Do you own any leather?" I can hear most asking "How the hell does someone like you get a column?"

The answers to the second and third question are no, and you would have to ask the editor. But don't question my rock 'n' roll expertise. For you see, I once was a rock 'n' roll star.

Those were the days. I remember the day we formed Kreull and the Moosemen. In much the same way as The Beatles and The Rolling Stones, we were young men drawn chimps can play them.

Shawn
Bruce

Collegian Columnist

Unencumbered by musical ability, we lined up our first gig. The coveted opening slot for the Kinsley High School Jazz Band at the high school's spring music concert. As we looked out over the audience, we could see they didn't care about some group called The Moosemen. It was the choir they had come to see.

That was until we hit the stage. As we tore into the blues number with all the fury our $59 Sears guitars could muster, the crowd went nuts. I know the tight trousers had something to do with it, but there was also something else going on. A feeling that nothing mattered except me and my guitar. As we went into the unmistakable opening chords of "Smoke," I looked at my fellow bandmates and saw they felt the same way.

We went on to play two more gigs but never recaptured the emotion of that first gig. Rumors of drug abuse haunted us, and Kreull's wife turned into a Yoko Ono look-alike. When Kreull announced he was leaving for a solo career, it came as no surprise.

There was talk of a reunion tour, but it never came together. The drummer went on to a career as a successful bag boy at the local grocery store. The rhythm guitar player is now a successful columnist who wears a beret. One guy joined the Army. Kreull became a born-again Christian and hasn't been heard from in a really long time. Sometimes I miss him.

And me? Eventually, I came to the decision that my future wasn't in the music industry. This decision was hastened by the fact that my parents stopped sending checks. I went back to school, got a column and pretty much have my life on track. At least to the point where Mom sends checks again.

But within me still beats the heart of a rock 'n' roller, and no matter how respectable I become, I'll never lose it. Because as long as I can yell "Manhattan, Kansas are you ready to rock?", I know that I'm alive. Rock on dude, rock on.

Another perspective

In today's complex world, it is easy to get caught up seeking simple solutions for complicated problems. Nowhere is this more true than in the problems that engulf the Middle East.

Even before Saddam Hussein was thrust into Americans' living rooms, the Middle East was a tinderbox waiting to erupt into flames. Everyone was dissatisfied — Lebanon wanted a government; Jordan wanted oil; the Palestinians wanted a homeland, and the Israelis wanted to keep theirs.

Now that the world has agreed that Saddam is "the great Satan," the temptation to further stereotype Arabs is even greater. With our friends and relatives dying in the gulf, it would be easy to picture all Arabs as enemies.

The war in the Persian Gulf is a war to fight aggression, not the Arab world. Americans must constantly remind themselves of that.

If we allow prejudices to invade our society, we will prove what Saddam has been saying all along — that the West does not care about the fates of Arabs, only the oil that they sit on.

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Staff

Barbara Robel, adviser for greek affairs, speaks to members of the Panhellenic Council at a meeting in the Delta Delta Delta house. She has been an adviser for greek organizations for the past 16 years.

Award given to Robel for efforts with greeks

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Fraternities and sororities at K-State benefit from the expertise and enthusiasm of one of the nation's top greek advisers.

Barb Robel, adviser for greek affairs, is nationally known for her work in fraternity and sorority systems. In December, she was given the Distinguished Service Award at the annual convention of the Association of Fraternity Advisers in New Orleans. The award, presented by other advisers, is the most prestigious given by the association.

Robel has also served as editor of the association's national newsletter.

The president of K-State's Panhellenic Council, Jenny Barenberg, senior in secondary education, said Robel has made K-State's greek system stronger by encouraging students to take on the leadership roles themselves.

"Her motto is 'The sky's the limit. Anything you want to do, I'll help you,'" Barenberg said.

Pat Bosco, vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, said Robel has been recognized nationally for her work with fraternities and sororities, and the system at K-State has won awards. He said Robel is constantly called upon by others because of her expertise.

"Our greek system, including students, alumni advisers and fraternity and sorority alumni, has benefitted from her guidance and facilitation skills," Bosco said.

Robel works through problems with the students, and that can be difficult.

"We have asked her to advise and guide rather than direct. That employs a whole range of skills, and Barb has them all," Bosco said.

Robel's interest in greek organizations began as an undergraduate member of a sorority at K-State. Robel spent six years as executive director for the Mid-America Panhellenic Council and Association.

She began working with the officers, housemothers and alumni advisers of greek organizations at K-State in 1974 when she was hired by the Panhellenic Council as an adviser. In 1979, the Interfraternity Council hired her as their adviser.

Robel said she firmly believes in the opportunities offered by greek life and feels a need to contribute to the greek system. She said the best part of her job is working with the students.

The success of K-State's greek system is due to the hard work of the student members, Robel said.

"An inherent factor in our strength is that we're in the Midwest and a basically work-oriented population. We have students that care," she said.

Robel said she hopes the system will continue to grow and stay in touch with the students' needs.

The problems, Robel said, the system will face in the future include the continuing need to emphasize and look for opportunities to enhance diversity within the system and the continuing need for alcohol education.

Radon found in local area

Present gas levels found to exceed EPA guidelines

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

Radon gas, the third greatest cause of lung cancer in the United States, has been found to be present at levels exceeding the Environmental Protection Agency's guidelines in 40 to 60 percent of homes tested in Riley County.

Bruce Snead, a residential energy specialist with the K-State Energy Extension office said, "The EPA's current estimate claims 17,000 people per year may die of lung cancer induced by radon."

The EPA's Radon Detection Kit defines radon as a naturally occurring gas that comes from the breakdown of uranium commonly found in soil.

Snead said air in the soil carries the gas through cracks and openings into houses where it collects. As the radon continues to decay into other elements it can deliver a dose of radioactive alpha particles. When these are breathed in, it may cause a change in chemistry or DNA of lung cells and possibly cause lung cancer.

"Iowa and Nebraska are two of the three states with the highest concentrations of radon gas," Snead said.

How radon seeps into homes

These are common places radon gas is likely to seep into homes. The gas can move through small spaces in the ground where a house is built. Radon may also enter through water faucets when a home relies on well water.

Source: Environmental Protection Agency

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

"Kansas does not have above average concentrations of radon, but we sit in the middle, leaving the potential for high levels. It can exist anywhere in the state.

"Basement apartments are more susceptible to high concentrations of the gas, but students don't spend many years in them. Lung cancer deals with long-term exposure," he said.

Homes may be initially tested with do-it-yourself testing kits offered by the Riley County Health Department, Snead said. The two-day screening measurements check to see if the problem should be ignored or if further testing should be done.

"Radon is not the cancer scare of the week," Snead said. "Short-term exposure is insignificant. It may take longer than five years to develop lung cancer."

Kits may be purchased for $10 at the Riley County Health Department, 2030 Tecumseh Road.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTSRose gets 2nd snub from Hall

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — The doors of Cooperstown slammed shut on Pete Rose when the Hall of Fame's board of directors voted 12-0 Monday to bar the banned baseball star from its ballot.

While the rule adopted Monday does not specifically mention Rose, the former Cincinnati Reds player and manager is the only living person on the permanently ineligible list.

Rose, the career leader in hits and games, can become eligible for the Hall ballot only if the baseball commissioner reinstates him by December 2005. None of the previous 14 individuals banned from baseball were reinstated.

"The directors felt that it would be incongruous to have a person who has been declared ineligible by baseball to be eligible or baseball's highest honor," Hall of Fame President Ed Stack said. "It follows that if such individual is reinstated by baseball, then such individual would be a candidate for election."

Rose was placed on the ineligible list Aug. 23, 1989, by the late commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti. The commissioner concluded after a six-month investigation that Rose bet on baseball games, including those involving the Reds.

Rose, a three-time National League batting champion and its Most Valuable Player in 1973, had been considered an odds-on favorite for first-year election until the investigation that led to his banishment. He would have been eligible for the first time this December.

However, former American League president Lee MacPhail and current AL president Bobby Brown last month proposed the rule to keep Rose off the ballot. No write-in votes are permitted under the rules of election.

"I had felt right from the start that if someone was ineligible, that person should not be considered for the Hall of Fame," Brown said.

Rose, who last month completed a five-month prison sentence for filing false federal income-tax returns, would not comment on the decision as he returned Monday to a Cincinnati halfway house. He is living there for three months as part of his sentence.

Brown and MacPhail were supported at Monday's meeting by a group largely made up of present and former baseball executives. Stack, who voted against the new rule at the Jan. 10 committee meeting, changed his mind and voted for it Monday.

Bob Broeg, a Hall director who is a writer for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, agreed with the baseball executives. He said he didn't think it would be right for Rose to be alongside other Hall of Famers in Cooperstown.

"He'd go in the first year and the next year he'd be signing autographs somewhere else for pay," Broeg said.

The Baseball Writers Association of America, which votes for the Hall of Fame, said it would announce the number of write-in votes for Rose each year, even though they won't count.

"We feel a significant number of people will write in Pete Rose's name despite the decision," BBWAA executive secretary Jack Lang said. "We feel it is incumbent upon us to make those votes known."

Rose batted .303 in a 24-year career and set records for hits (4,256), games (3,562), at-bats (14,053) and singles (3,215). He was the NL Rookie of the Year in 1963, the World Series MVP in 1975 and won NL batting titles in 1968, 1969 and 1973.

Last season, ESPN and K-State made an unbeatable team. And if there is ever a time for K-State to regain its success on ESPN, it is tonight at 6:35 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Billy Tubbs and the run-and-gun Oklahoma Sooners have rolled into Manhattan, and K-State is hoping to dash their hopes with another upset victory.

Last year, the Wildcats shut down Oklahoma with strong defense, holding them 71 points below their scoring average, and captured a 66-51 victory over the No. 3 ranked Sooners.

This season the Sooners aren't ranked as highly — they check in at No. 23 — but carry a 15-6 overall record and 4-3 mark in the Big Eight. The game is equally as important for the Wildcats, as are all of their remaining Big Eight games if they want to move out of the conference cellar.

"Oklahoma has another very fine basketball team. I think they will come in here and play hard. It should be a very good game," K-State coach Dana Altman said.

K-State is coming off of its first conference victory this season, and is looking for its second against a team that has had woes in Manhattan. Oklahoma is 25-46 against K-State in Manhattan, but is 6-5 under Tubbs.

Altman said he is mainly concerned with the arsenal of weapons that Tubbs possesses every year and the amount of points those weapons can put on the scoreboard.

The two top weapons are freshman Jeff Webster and 3-point specialist Brent Price, both average about 20 points per game. Yet the scorers keep coming in Kermit Holmes, who has been sidelined indefinitely with a knee injury, Terry Evans, and a bench that runs extremely deep.

"What concerns us the most is their ability to score points. They have a lot of offensive weapons," Altman said.

K-State perhaps put one of its better performances together last Saturday to squeak past Colorado 73-72. Altman praised the defense, rebounding and shooting. The Wildcats had a pleasant change from shooting 45 percent from the field and connected on 64 percent in the second half.

Oklahoma is the second of a three-game homestand for K-State, whose mood has been lifted along with the fans'. Altman said the K-State fans made the difference in the Colorado game.

"Our mood is better, considering we were struggling. The win helped pick us up," Altman said. "The other day, the fans were very important. The students have been great. Without them we would be in more trouble than we are in."

K-State center Maurice Brittian battles with Colorado's Shawn Vandiver for a rebound during the Wildcats' 73-72 win Saturday. K-State looks to make it two in a row in the league tonight.

Reunion rare chance to mingle with greats

Bill
Lang

Sports Reporter

Well, as some of you know, I am an older student — as to how old I really am, let's just say that I remember the starting lineup for the K-State men's basketball team of 1981-82.

But we'll leave Tyrone Adams, Randy Reed, Ed Nealey, Les Craft and Tim Jankovich out of this.

This narrative is about the tradition of K-State basketball and what it means to this university.

This past weekend, the 1950-51 men's team had its 40-year reunion, and to see these "giants" of K-State basketball and to listen to them reminisce was a real treat.

There were two All-Americans standing in front of me: Ernie Barrett and Dick Knostman. Barrett was also an all-Big Seven player along with Jack Stone and Lew Hitch.

This was a team that went 25-4 and bowed to Kentucky in the NCAA finals. Sure they lost the game, but to some of the players it was what Kentucky coach Adolph Rupp did before the game that set a tone of intimidation.

"Right as we were getting dressed before the game, we hear the door open up to our locker room," Jim Iverson said. "In pops Adolph Rupp's head and he bellows, 'Gentlemen, I just want you to know that it's an honor to be on the same floor with you guys.'"

"We just sat there and that was on our minds the whole game. He was pretty good at that stuff."

To hear them talk about Ahearn Field House in the early years was incredible.

Did you know that when they opened it in 1951, no one ever dreamed of it being the home of the best team in the 1950s and early '60s.

Also, when it first opened, there were no showers. The players put on their uniforms in what was once Nichols Gymnasium.

"We had these big old hooded jackets and really baggy pants," Knostman said. "We would just walk in a side door in those uniforms and come in from underneath the stands ... I think that was intimidating to the other team. We just thought we were getting out of the cold and ready for a game."

It was after the game that fun really began. At that time showers were not in Ahearn, but still in Nichols. The players would ride a bus — when it worked — and go take their showers at Nichols.

"When we played Kansas for the second time that season, we had a tough win against them," Knostman said. "I guess some of their fans got a little upset with that and sabotaged our bus. Man, that was a cold run to the showers."

The coach at the time was one of the game's great masterminds, Jack Gardner. To hear the players talk about him, you would think that he was a god of some sort.

"He would just sit there and watch the other team warmup and then he knew their strengths and weaknesses," Stone said. "He also knew how to take risks better than anybody else."

He was referring to the recruiting of Ed Head. Head was a junior varsity player in the Los Angeles area. But by the word of Stone, Gardner took a risk and signed him.

"If he didn't push me in practice, I wouldn't have been an All-American," Stone said. "Our second team was probably as good as any one team in the country. And believe me, we know."

Sure, this sounds like a recap of all the festivities this weekend. But to see these guys get together and reminisce was a real treat. To see their love for K-State basketball endure after 40 years was incredible.

So where does that leave us? Some of the alumni felt that the students have pulled themselves away from the team because of its record. In their eyes, this is blasphemy!

So where does this leave you? It should leave you seated in Bramlage tonight showing the "gods" of K-State basketball just how wrong they are.

The players know how special the homecourt advantage is at K-State, and the opposing Big Eight coaches know that K-State has distinct advantage when it comes to homecourt advantage. So keep up the good work.

Hazim honored once again

K-State's Nadira Hazim was named the Big Eight's Player-of-the-Week Monday for the second consecutive week.

In two games last week, Hazim scored 52 points and grabbed 14 rebounds to lead the Lady Cats to their fourth straight win and a first-place tie with Oklahoma State atop the conference standings.

"Nadira isn't really doing anything unusual because she is doing it within our system," said K-State coach Susan Yow. "She is just really in sync right now, and it's an understatement to say she's having a great year."

In the Lady Cats' 74-73 overtime win at Kansas last Wednesday, Hazim scored a game-high 27 points and grabbed nine rebounds. She was also the key down the stretch in that game as she scored eight of K-State's final 17 points.

The 5-7 senior from Topeka then scored a game high 25 points and pulled down five rebounds in Saturday's 66-62 win over Missouri. Hazim has now scored 20-plus points in seven consecutive games and leads the Big Eight with 23.5 scoring average in conference play.

K-State's total.

That would leave the 'Cats with four scholarships. Last year, Snyder signed 25 players on the first day of the signing period.

"We will not fill up our scholarships on the first day," Snyder said. "That may not take place for several weeks."

Under NCAA rules, Snyder is not allowed to comment on prospects until they have signed national letters. He did, however, say what the 'Cats were hoping to accomplish with this year's recruiting class.

"We believe we've covered every position, although our main focus is linemen," Snyder said. "You can't ever have enough of them."

Snyder said he is expecting to sign eight linemen, four on offense and four on defense. One player is Manhattan High's Brian Lojka, a 6-foot-6, 230-pounder who played tight end and defensive tackle for Coach Lew Lane's Indians.

"The fact that he was as versatile as he was made him attractive to K-State," Lane said. "He runs well for a big man, and he is every bit of 6-6. We tried him out at defensive tackle as an experiment, and he turned out to be one of our top linemen."

Lojka, who is a center on the Indian basketball team, has been out of action the last three weeks with an ankle injury. Lane said he did not expect the injury to be serious.

Lojka's teammate, Steve Hanks, also plans on signing with the 'Cats. Hanks, a 6-foot, 190-pounder, played defensive back and wide receiver for the Indians.

"Steve was a two-year starter for us, and that's kind of a rarity at our place," Lane said. "He's an awfully good football player."

Hanks was Lane's return specialist last season, and returned a punt and kickoff for touchdowns against Class 6A runner-up Garden City.

"Coach Snyder is getting two very versatile athletes," Lane said. "His staff is very committed to keeping the Kansas kids from leaving the state, and I think they've stuck to their word."

Snyder said he expects to supplement his recruiting class with "a quality running back, a high quality receiver, and another quarterback."

"Because we're so low in numbers at every position, we have to focus across the board," Snyder said. "But when you look at rosters of other teams, about 50 percent of their players are linemen. I think we're pretty close to that way of thinking."

K-State has also received oral commitments from two other in-state linemen. Jeff Smith, 6-1, 257, from Arkansas City, reportedly chose the 'Cats over Kansas and Oklahoma State. The other is Dirk Ochs, 6-6, 215, from Shawnee Mission South.

Snyder also received an oral commitment from lineman Robert Pearson of R.L. Turner High School in Carrollton, Texas. That's the same school that produced former Wildcat James Enin-Okut.

A trio of two-year walk-ons — Josh Kolb, Joe Boone and Matt Argo — were also given scholarships for the upcoming year. Their scholarships will not count against K-State's annual limit, but will be part of the maximum allotment for an NCAA Division I program, which is 95.

One of Snyder's biggest challenges since coming to K-State in 1989 has been bringing the program closer to the NCAA maximum. Probation sanctions from the 1970s and constant attrition have dwindled K-State's numbers.

Oklahoma State moves into poll

By the Associated Press

UNLV was No. 1 in the Associated Press basketball poll for the 12th straight week, this time unanimously again, and Oklahoma State moved into the rankings for the first time this season Monday.

UNLV (18-0), the only unbeaten Division I team, received all 63 first-place votes and 1,575 points from a panel of sportswriters and sportscasters.

Nos. 2-3-4 remained unchanged as well, with Arkansas (22-1), Ohio State (18-1) and Indiana (20-2) occupying those spots. UNLV plays at Arkansas Sunday, and Coach Jerry Tarkanian admits he's thinking about the 1-2 matchup.

"I'd be lying if I said I wasn't," he said. First, the Runnin' Rebels have to play Fresno State on Thursday.

UNLV kept its record intact on Sunday with a 115-73 rout of Rutgers. The Rebels were unanimous No. 1 picks three weeks in a row until last week, when Ohio State got two first-place votes.

Oklahoma State (15-4) moved into the rankings for the first time this season at No. 22 after an 81-68 victory over Nebraska. There was one other new poll member, No. 25 Michigan State (13-6), which was ranked twice previously this season and as high as No. 4 in preseason.

Arkansas, coming off a 100-87 victory over Rice, had 1,512 points, followed by Ohio State with 1,405 and Indiana with 1,392. Ohio State lost to Michigan State 75-61 earlier in the week, and Indiana is coming off a 77-66 victory over Minnesota.

Football team makes signing linemen top priority

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

If things go according to plan, expect 18 new members of the K-State football team on Wednesday.

Coach Bill Snyder said that is the number of oral commitments he has received from junior college and high school prospects to join the Wildcats. Wednesday is the first day that national letters of intent can be signed.

Snyder has also awarded three scholarships out of the NCAA's annual limit of 25 to senior David Gleue and sophomores Tate Wright and J.J. Smith. All have been in the K-State program for one year as walk-ons, and NCAA rules state that their scholarships must count against

K-State's total.

That would leave the 'Cats with four scholarships. Last year, Snyder signed 25 players on the first day of the signing period.

"We will not fill up our scholarships on the first day," Snyder said. "That may not take place for several weeks."

Under NCAA rules, Snyder is not allowed to comment on prospects until they have signed national letters. He did, however, say what the 'Cats were hoping to accomplish with this year's recruiting class.

Lights show troop support

Red Cross selling wristbands to assist military families

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

Chances are that in the past two weeks you've noticed more than an occasional car with its headlights on in broad daylight, or maybe you've seen students wearing brown plastic wristbands. These are just a few of the newest expressions of support for U.S. troops in the gulf.

KDDV 100.3, a radio station broadcasting out of Topeka, began requesting listeners to leave their headlights on during daylight hours as an expression of support for U.S. troops on Jan. 16.

Greg Phillips, operations manager of V100.3, said the idea evolved out of a staff meeting. Headlights were chosen because they aren't normally used during the day and would therefore attract attention throughout the community.

"It's just a gesture for people to go the extra mile to do something they wouldn't normally do," he said.

Although V100.3 supports U.S. troops in the gulf, Phillips said it is not endorsing war.

"This is not in support of the war. The lights-on promotion is in support of the troops in the Middle East."

Phillips said V100.3 has received several calls from listeners in support of the promotion and has yet to receive any in opposition.

"Folks have called and said it is a good gesture. Obviously, not everyone in Topeka is doing it," he said.

The station will continue the promotion as long as U.S. troops are fighting in the gulf. Phillips said they plan to do other promotions for the troops, but he was not ready to comment on any details.

"We urge everyone in Manhattan to do it from V100.3," said Phillips.

Since Jan. 14, the Manhattan chapter of the American Red Cross has been selling plastic "Desert Storm" wristbands to support the U.S. troops. A purpose of the Red Cross is to aid military families during a military crisis.

"Basically, in military matters we are the liaison between family and military units," said Leslie Rose, executive assistant for the Manhattan Red Cross. "This doesn't mean we support what is going on. I don't even wear the bracelet myself. I think if my husband was over there, I might. I do have yellow ribbons hanging around the house."

Rose said she and Beryl Adams, director of the Manhattan Red Cross, were eager to sell the wristbands since both of their husbands are in the military, and they understand the support military families need at this time.

The idea to sell wristbands was started by the Topeka organization Project Cheers. Rose said they order them from a man in Topeka who distributes them out of his home.

"We have the first 250 sold, and we have ordered 500 more. How many of the 500 we've sold, I don't know," she said.

Adams said wristbands were chosen to show support because they are easy to wear. She said the idea goes back to the POW-MIA bracelets worn during the Vietnam War. The bracelets were made of brass and cost two dollars. Each bracelet was engraved with the name of a soldier missing in action or a prisoner of war.

"The idea behind the bracelets is to wear them until the troops return," Adams said.

For $1, anyone can buy a wristband. The first to come out were printed with the words Desert Shield, but they have since been changed to Desert Storm. The money raised through the sale of the wristbands goes to help local military families. Both Adams and Rose agreed the proceeds give them more flexibility in the amount they can aid military families.

Presently, they are providing aid to two local families. One is a military wife who is receiving aid to buy formula for her newborn while her husband is in the gulf. The Red Cross is also helping another Manhattan family pay electric bills.

Stores to contribute money to Red Cross

LISA NOLL
Collegian Reporter

One penny may not seem like a lot to most people, but to many military families it can mean getting the bills paid on time.

The EZ shops in Kansas and Missouri are donating one cent for every gallon of gasoline they sell to the American Red Cross through Feb. 6.

The Red Cross then gives the money to military families to help out in emergency situations.

Beryl Adams, executive director for the Riley County Red Cross, said the purpose is to meet emergency needs for military families because of separation or decreased salaries.

"We mainly help them with rent or utilities," Adams said.

Becky Barnett, field marketing director for the EZ Shops, said during a good week they sell an average of 300,000 gallons of gasoline. The projected goal is about $3,000.

"I really think it's a good deal," Barnett said, "and it's nice knowing that money will help those who need it."

The EZ Shops, along with other area businesses, are also selling Desert Storm bracelets for $1. All of these proceeds will be given to the Red Cross.

"We are anticipating increased business, and we want to share that profit with the Red Cross," Barnett said.

Adams said the local Red Cross chapter has been receiving numerous donations from various organizations and businesses. Many of these donations are designated specifically for the families of the soldiers in the gulf.

Band reunites, releases album

Rockers find music industry appalling

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

Two members of the rock group Shooting Star were in Manhattan Feb. 4 promoting the release of their new album "It's Not Over" by doing an interview at KMKF radio.

It was the first stop for the group, and the first time anyone in the country had heard the new material.

"It's really cool to finally hear this on the radio — I mean that's one year's work," said Keith Mitchell, lead vocalist.

After releasing five albums between 1980 and 1986, the band has only released two albums in the past five years, one of which is their new album.

Most rock stars have a story to tell about going through the school of hard knocks to get where they are now, but Shooting Star may have written the book.

The band's first three albums had short lives because of internal problems with the record company. The next two albums talked of the band's frustration with the business side of music, and in 1986 the band broke up. Fans, however, remained loyal.

After a legal battle with the band's record company, "The Best of Shooting Star" was released in 1989 and immediately sold more than a million copies.

The album contained a previously unreleased track called "Touch Me Tonight" that stayed in the Top 10 of the MTV Video Countdown for more than 30 days. That success gave Shooting Star the upper hand they needed to deal with the record companies.

"The cool thing is when "Touch Me Tonight" was beginning to happen, we weren't even a band. It put us in an incredible position of power," said Van McLain, lead guitarist. "So then we had all these record companies wanting to talk to us saying, 'We got to have you guys,' and we were able to get control."

"We told them we were producing the music, we were doing the songs we wanted to do, and we made them put it in the contract," he said.

The songs on the new album show the band's attitude toward the business side of music and how they feel much of today's music is manufactured.

"I think the biggest point I want to make is if someone is legitimately making music of his choice, more power to him," McLain said. "It's the manufactured crap where a bunch of record company guys take some model and say 'You're going to be a rap singer.'"

"I think that's what gets me," he said. "If music's real and from the heart, I may hate it, but that's what music's all about."

Shooting Star's music unimpressive; new titles remakes of old themes

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

Shooting Star is back with mindless metal and gut-level boredom. Their latest release, "It's Not Over," brought the group back together for what sounds more like reminiscing than recreation.

Reviewer says ...

It is over!

This entire album is predictable and familiar. One look at the lyric sheet made me hope the music quality would redeem the simplicity. Another look at the lyric sheet made me wonder why they had even bothered to type up the words.

About every song on the album, except a couple of the slow ones, had one of three rock beats, heavy and whining guitar riffs, keyboards in the background and rasping vocals. Shooting Star sounds like a lot of other groups. They really have nothing innovative to offer, except that they are from Kansas.

This same type of album from Gorky Park a few years ago brought more critical acclaim than this album probably will, only because Gorky Park is Russian. That may be an excuse or an incentive to by an otherwise bland recording.

The best use for this album might be as a record of the rock era. Not because Shooting Star has a classic sound or undeniable talent, but because, like those little pictures in the dictionary, they stereotype rock music. Maybe someday a small sketch of the group will appear next to the word "rock."

Colorado's Favorite

We're Colorado's Favorite Ski Resort for lots of reasons. Like more snow. Year in and year out, we average more than any other major Colorado ski area: almost 31 feet per year. That snow means consistently great skiing on our three interconnected mountains. We have the variety to excite any level of skier, from the gentle, well-mannered slopes of Vasquez Ridge to the awesome chutes and bumps of Mary Jane. We keep things moving with 19 lifts, including three quad SuperChairs. The new Zephyr Express will zip you from the bottom to the top of Winter Park in just 7 minutes. Families love our expansive Children's Center, and everyone agrees that we may just be the friendliest ski area in Colorado. For a great value on a Colorado ski vacation you'll never forget. Come Play at the Park!

RCGS assists in research of ancestry history in area

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

Family history is what Riley County Genealogical Society is all about.

Sherry Butler, who is in charge of publicity for RCGS, said the interest in ancestry research is growing in popularity, and classes are being offered to help that interest.

The RCGS library is in what used to be the Platt House at 2005 Claflin. The RCGS pamphlet states the house was originally owned by Jeremiah Platt, who taught at Bluemont College — which is now K-State — from 1864-84.

The library is run by volunteers and funded by dues and donations, Butler said. Anyone is allowed to use the library, but a $10 fee is required to be a member. This entitles them to check out periodicals and have their names put on file. She said there are about 300 members belonging to RCGS.

"The interest has really picked up," Butler said. "People write from all over the country wanting information."

Butler said the RCGS library concentrates on Kansas, but still has a wide variety of information. Books on famine immigrants, adoption, New England states and Irish immigrants are just a few examples of the various information available.

Dan Walter, a member who teaches Beginning Genealogy, wrote a book in 1989 on the history of Aggieville. He said he was intrigued by the material in the library when he joined three years ago.

Walter started what is now a hobby by researching his wife's family history.

"My goal is to have enough family history to help my children appreciate history as a subject," Walter said.

He said his class is geared towards getting people started researching family history.

Other classes being taught are English Research, and Finding Evidence and Proof of Genealogical Facts, Walter said.

The one-night, two-hour classes are scheduled for the spring and fall, Butler said. Non-members are able to take the classes for a $3 fee. Each class has an enrollment of about 15 people. Classes started on Feb. 4 and continue throughout the month.

Information varies depending on the class, but all include how to research lineages by using available documents such as wills, court records and birth certificates.

Walter said a lot of people become interested in genealogy after the death of parents.

"We try to encourage people to put down more than a name and a date when doing a family tree," Butler said.

Star

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 8 to the word rock 'n' roll in the dictionary. If it does, that may be the only real fame they achieve.

The rock elements in the music of Shooting Star were a blatant reminder of how easily a certain sound can be copied. Rock fans may be fooled by the cheap imitation of Shooting Star's album, "It's Not Over." They may even be pleased with what they hear because it sounds like rock music — it's just not quality rock music.

There are no new licks, no innovative sounds, no entertaining lyrics and nothing that needs to be censored. Shooting Star just doesn't seem to have worked very hard on this album. Or maybe they never listened to the radio and really didn't know this has all been done before.

Songs like, "Rebel With A Cause," "If You've Got Love," and "Blame It On The Night," are really boring. Even Shooting Star must be bored to play these re-runs.

The title of the album, "It's Not Over" seems to try to tell us the band is back. I think the only thing this title succeeds in communicating is the impatience we feel listening to songs that never seem to end. Perhaps a better title would have been, "Do we have to listen to the rest?"

Merger

Krause said the faculty was assured KCT would retain its identity, as well as gain significant benefits by being a part of K-State.

KCT will continue to offer its current programs, and K-State will transfer its four-year engineering technology program to the Salina campus. Students now at K-State will not be affected.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

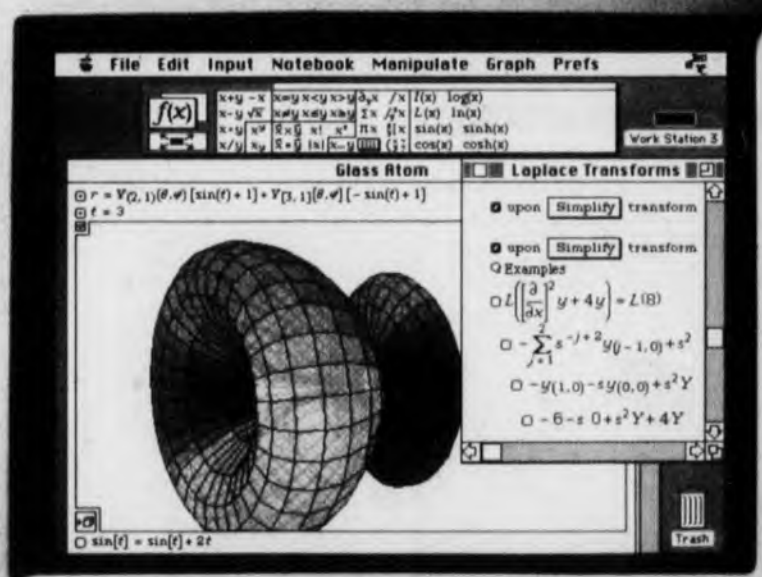

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

Vietnam veterans, Frank Saal, head of the psychology department, and Richard Burke, marketing instructor, said they are glad to see support of the war.

Faculty reminded of Vietnam War

Former soldiers say support for troops in gulf important

CHRISTINE SPLICAL
Collegian Reporter

As two K-State faculty members watch the gulf war they can't help but think of the days they spent as soldiers. Frank "Skip" Saal, head of the psychology department, and Richard Burke, marketing instructor, are both Vietnam veterans. Saal, formerly an Army 1st lieutenant in infantry, said many people saw more combat than he did, but what he saw was enough to make him appreciate what is currently going on in the gulf. Not a day goes by when he doesn't think of Vietnam in some way, and the gulf war has brought back a lot of feelings, he said.

"I am gratified to see much broader support for the men and women in the Gulf," Saal said. "That was something we didn't have. The war was very unpopular, and some people thought we were just plain stupid for doing such dumb and immoral things."

Burke, formerly an Army captain in the 1st Air Cavalry Division, Airborne Ranger, also said he often thinks of Vietnam.

"When you go through a highly emotional experience, not necessarily a war, it becomes a very strong focal point. It's a focal point both bad and good that has helped shape my life."

Burke said he is delighted with the current support given to our troops, and hopes it will not waiver as it did during the Vietnam War.

Saal said he was gratified to see political leaders explicitly say the military will be allowed to fight without one hand tied behind their back like in Vietnam.

Another positive difference Saal said he noticed was the fact that men are being sent over in units as opposed to being rotated in and out individually.

"Comradery of people is a real source of comfort, and when the bullets start to fly, you fight for yourself and the guy next to you," Saal said. "In many ways it was one of the most traumatic and focused times in my life. The whole experience was unique."

Coalition shatters morning peace

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN — Allied warplanes and the USS Missouri's guns shattered the morning peace from Baghdad to Kuwait's embattled shores Tuesday. Iraq banned sales of heating oil and other fuel to its increasingly desperate people.

Baghdad said 428 civilians have been killed thus far in what the official radio condemned as "savage" bombing.

The Syrian contingent in Operation Desert Storm engaged in its first combat, driving 30 Iraqi intruders back into Kuwait with artillery fire, Saudi officials reported.

In telephone calls and private meetings, diplomats and government leaders conferred on Monday's bid by Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani to mediate a Persian Gulf peace.

The Soviets and Turks signaled support for Iran's initiative. In Washington, however, President Bush said he had seen no Iranian peace plan and saw nothing to negotiate with Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

"He's got to say, 'I'm going to get out of Kuwait,' now, fast," Bush said.

The U.S. chief executive said he was sending the Pentagon's top leadership — Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and Gen. Colin Powell — to the war zone this week to assess how the U.S.-led offensive is progressing.

The U.S. command reported another 2,000-sortie day in the Desert Storm air war, and said American warplanes took special aim again at the dug-in Republican Guard, backbone of the Iraqi defense of Kuwait.

Six "packages" of B-52 strategic bombers struck Guard positions, the command said.

It said U.S. warplanes also continued focusing on resupply lines to the Iraqi troops in Kuwait and southern Iraq, striking a 25-truck convoy in one instance late Monday. British officers reported strikes on an ammunition storage site south of Baghdad and a railway junction and rail bridge in southeast Iraq, among other targets.

They said one-third of the key bridges in Iraq have been destroyed.

The U.S. command reported, the Missouri's 16-inch guns opened up twice overnight — once with six rounds that knocked out part of a long-range Iraqi artillery battery shelling coalition troops across the border in Saudi Arabia, and once with 28 rounds that destroyed an Iraqi radar site.

Gorbachev holds firm in Baltics

Independence poll rejected, Kremlin-controlled referendum ordered in its place

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail Gorbachev stepped up his war of words with Lithuanian leaders on Tuesday by rejecting their independence poll set for Saturday and ordering a Kremlin-controlled referendum.

Lithuanian President Vytautas Landsbergis insisted the nonbinding ballot would be held as planned.

The decree followed Gorbachev's order for new talks with the Baltics and seemed a clear attempt to force Lithuanians to seek independence only on the Kremlin's terms. It did not threaten any action if the poll was held, indicating only that the Kremlin would not accept its results.

"The poll and the attempt to call it a 'plebiscite on the future of the Lithuania state' (are) legally invalid," his decree said, according to the state news agency, Tass.

The poll cannot be seen as anything other than an attempt to block the holding of a national referendum on the question of preserving the Soviet Union, said Gorbachev, who has called for all 15 republics to vote March 17 on whether to preserve the union.

He ordered national authorities and Soviet-controlled officials in Lithuania to ensure strict implementation of the national referendum.

That referendum will ask: "Do you think it is necessary to preserve the Soviet Union as a renewed federation of equal, sovereign republics in which the rights and freedoms of people of all ethnic groups will be fully guaranteed?"

The Lithuanian poll asks: "Do you support the idea that Lithuania must be an independent, democratic republic?"

Soviet experts have noted that both questions are loaded to elicit "Yes" responses.

At least five republics have refused to hold referendums under Soviet law, which they reject on their territory.

Three of the republics, including Lithuania, scheduled alternative polls. Gorbachev's decree Tuesday did not mention Estonia's vote on March 3 or Georgia's on March 31.

Lithuanian leaders are taking advantage of the aggravated social-political atmosphere in the republic. Lithuania's leadership is trying, with the help of this poll, to organize support for its separatist aspirations, the decree said.

Landsbergis has labeled Saturday's vote as a plebiscite on the future of the Lithuanian state.

But the pro-Kremlin Lithuanian Civil Committee and the Loyalist Lithuanian Communist Party urged a boycott of the poll. They have conceded they probably would lose, but blame Lithuania's citizenship law that they say denies votes to many Soviet soldiers posted in the republic.

Finney, College of Human Ecology to meet

By the Collegian Staff

The College of Human Ecology doesn't know what Gov. Finney is going to say to them, but they know what they're going to say to her.

At the college's invitation, Finney will meet with Dean Barbara Stowe, department heads, faculty and two student leaders at 6 p.m. in the K-

State Union Sunflower Room for dinner and a presentation.

Each department head will give a brief description to Finney to let her know what the College of Human Ecology is and what it does. The college wants to show how its programs are important to Kansas.

"There are issues that we could provide information and background for policies that the government is working on," Stowe said.

It is a chance to acquaint the governor with the work going on in the college and the resources available to her. The college has compiled a directory of issues Finney talked about during her campaign that will be presented to her at the dinner.

"We do this periodically when new Legislatures come into office," Stowe said.

It is an opportunity for Finney to speak with faculty about higher education, Stowe said. Finney will then answer questions in an open discussion.

K-State workers run for election

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

Editor's note: this is the second of three articles on candidates in the Manhattan City Commission race. Tomorrow's article will focus on Roger Maughmer, Stanley Crowder and Linda Ferguson.

Three K-State employees are among the seven candidates in the race for Manhattan City Commission, although none of them emphasize their university connection.

"We're citizens of Manhattan who just happen to be at the University," said Helen Cooper, management analyst for facilities planning. "I think we're all concerned with Manhattan."

Edith Stunkel, assistant director of social anthropology and social work, said she agreed.

"I don't identify with just the University," Stunkel said. "It's a part of who I am, but it's not my entire identity."

Cooper said the diverse backgrounds of the three offset the fact that they work for the same university. With a different background comes a different perspective, something vital to a smooth-working commission.

City Commission Elections

For instance, Cooper earned a bachelor's degree in business administration and a master's degree in public administration from K-State. James Dubois, associate professor of interior architecture, completed his undergraduate work in architecture, also at K-State, and then earned his master's degree in architecture with an emphasis in urban design.

Stunkel earned her bachelor's degree in psychology from Brown University and her master's degree in social welfare with a specialty in gerontology from the University of California at Berkeley.

Cooper has been a permanent Manhattan resident since 1966, Dubois since 1982 and Stunkel since 1977.

Women's group to counter boycott

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — The Utah Association of Women says it will counter a threatened feminist boycott of the state over recent passage of stringent anti-abortion legislation.

Susan Roylance, president-elect of the 300-member UAW, said Monday her group wants to make sure it is known that most women in predominantly Mormon Utah oppose legalized abortion.

"We feel a statement needs to be made that the Legislature did represent the women of Utah," Roylance said. "As women, and mothers, we appreciate this effort by our Legislature to help protect the young women of Utah from those who would become wealthy through the destruction of unborn children."

The new law bans abortions except in cases of rape and incest, or where the mother's health is imperiled or the fetus has grave physical defects.

Murder trial begins for 21-year-old

INDEPENDENCE (AP) — The murder trial of a man accused of beating an elderly woman with a shovel and killing her began Tuesday in Montgomery County District Court.

Jason "Jay" Linn, 21, of rural Independence, is charged with the first-degree murder of Vicie Teal, 86, as well as with aggravated battery and aggravated burglary.

Teal and her husband, Oliver, were beaten with a shovel during a break-in at their home last May. Vicie Teal died the following day. Her husband, who is expected to testify, was hospitalized several days.

Montgomery County Attorney Terry Todd said he expected the trial that began before Judge David Thompson to last until Friday.

Driving privileges may be revoked

TOPEKA (AP) — Some Kansas teen-agers are angry about a House bill that would eliminate driving privileges for 14- and 15-year-olds.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Mark Parkinson, R-Olathe, said current driving regulations are costing younger drivers their lives.

Current law allows 14- and 15-year-olds who pass a state driving test to drive to school, to work or when accompanied by a licensed adult.

Parkinson said he introduced the bill Tuesday because a 14-year-old driver was two-and-a-half times more likely than a 16-year-old driver to be involved in a fatal collision.

Since 1986, there has been an average of 67 fatal or serious accidents a year involving drivers under 16, he said.

"I think it's time that we do something," Parkinson said. "In my view, no amount of inconvenience is too great to change the policy."

But several teen-agers said many 14- and 15-year-olds need to drive. Others questioned the validity of Parkinson's statistics.

Student collapses, dies during game

ALLEN (AP) — A high school sophomore collapsed and died during a basketball game Tuesday.

Travis Sheeley had played about 10 minutes when he stumbled and fell to the floor about 5:30 p.m. and stopped breathing, said Northern Heights High School basketball coach Robert Criss.

Attempts to revive the youth by those at the game and by a medical team were unsuccessful. The boy, whose age was not immediately known, was dead on arrival at Newman Hospital in Emporia, 25 miles south of Allen, Criss said.

An autopsy was to be performed Wednesday, Sedgwick County Coroner William Eckert said.

Criss said Sheeley, a forward for the team, was an excellent athlete who also ran cross-country.

"He was probably one of the fittest athletes up there," he said.

The coach said he did not know what might have caused the boy's death.

City looks to restrict exotic dancing

GREAT BEND (AP) — City officials have delayed action on a proposed ordinance to restrict exotic dancing in Great Bend.

With a large crowd present for Monday night's discussion, the city council voted 4-3 to table two proposals on what parts of a dancer's body must be covered.

Officials said they would examine the issue again after the U.S. Supreme Court rules on the constitutionality of laws banning exotic dancing — or if problems develop before then.

The city has no laws specifically addressing the issue, and the council has been presented two versions of an ordinance, one more restrictive than the other.

Patty Chain, owner of the Players Club, said it has more than 1,000 members, all over 21, who paid $10 each to join. She said her club features topless — but not nude — dancing, and it has not presented problems for the community.

Campus

Candidates to take part in forum

Candidates for assistant personnel director of K-State will answer questions for faculty and students in open forums Feb. 7, 8 and 11.

The forum will take place at 1:30 p.m. each day in the K-State Union Little Theatre.

"The students and faculty will fill out response sheets to give us their impression of the viability of the candidates," said Alonzo White, Director of Personnel Services.

Three candidates have been chosen for interviews out of 110 applications. Applications began arriving in December and the process was closed in January, said Merry Lu Pasley, office assistant in Personnel Services.

The assistant personnel director is in charge of employee grievances and monitoring University dispute resolutions for classified employees, White said. The assistant director also helps K-State look at productive assets for employees.

U.S. slang new to foreigners

VALERIE HEARON
Collegian Reporter

"He dissed me," "I'm stuffed," "she's hot" and "spit it out." These terms are familiar to most Americans. International students, however, not only have to learn proper English, but English slang as well.

With so many dialects and trendy slang that comes in as fast as it goes out, it is no wonder people say English is the hardest language to learn.

"Some words I know, but most of the time I don't, and it is difficult. I wasn't exposed to that kind of language," said Sosuk Kim, graduate student from Korea.

Kim says he watches soap operas daily to learn more English. "I have a plan to improve my English," Kim said. "I set up my school schedule so I could watch television in the afternoons."

Many visitors to the United States may find slang silly and useless.

"It depends on the society you live in. Slang in my country is not as popular as it is here," said Frank Tel, graduate student from Holland.

Many students who are learning the slang turn to familiar resources to help them find out what the slang means.

"I always ask friends first or look it up in the dictionary," said Bertrand Bouchut, freshman in grain science.

Many students that have come here from other countries will have many different sayings to take back with them.

"The funny expressions I will bring back to France with me," Bouchut said. "I will try to translate it into our own slang, but it may not mean anything and it will be humorous."

Hog industry faces 'big producer syndrome'

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

About 200 swine producers took notes at K-State Tuesday on how to become more profitable in 1991.

Experts from Columbia, Mo., to Washington, D.C., spoke to them at the Swine Profitability Conference in Forum Hall.

"The hog industry has the big producer syndrome," said Glen Grimes, University of Missouri-Columbia agricultural economist. "But it's not important yet."

From 1969 to 1987, the number of farms selling less than 1,000 hogs annually decreased 64 percent while the number of farms selling over 1,000 hogs annually increased 264 percent.

He said corporate farms like Murphy's Farms and Cargill have 6 percent of hog production market. They could grow to 15 percent and add about 1 percent increase in hog supply.

"You don't have to be big to be competitive," he said. "Fifty sows can be competitive."

Farmers producing 50 hogs could join together with their neighbor in marketing to offset costs. Inefficient producers need to possess the attitude necessary "to get them up to speed," he said.

The poultry industry is more integrated than the hog industry. Integration occurs when two or more functions performed separately in the past are tied together either by contract or ownership.

"In my opinion, odds are very low that we will go (concentrated) like the poultry industry," Grimes said.

Hog production is still dominated by individual ownership. Most producers worried about contract production are the producers not involved, Grimes said.

Tyson and National Farms, large hog farms, are involved with contracting. However, they have not integrated in commercial feeding or packing, he said.

Swine production trends in other states change the demand for pork in Kansas. Swine production is traditionally strong where relatively low-cost feed is available.

Outside the Corn Belt, North Carolina is one state that has significantly increased production in the 1980s. To a lesser degree, Arkansas and Pennsylvania have also grown. This growth can be partially due to larger-sized producers and contract production, he said.

A more important factor is the trend in some states of a concentration of larger packing plants.

Larry Werries, director of inter-governmental affairs for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, talked about the 1990 Farm Bill.

"As the United States has only 5 percent of world's population," he said. "Exports are the only real choice for boosting the U.S. economy."

Governmental support some farmers receive is based on what the market will do and not on the 1990 Farm Bill, he said.

"You and I as farmers would rather get dollars from the market (than government support)," he said.

The USDA has a budget of $55 billion. About $30 billion is for food assistance programs, including food stamps, he said.

"Not all the gravy goes to the farmers," Werries said.

EDITORIAL

Group necessary for individual personality

Last weekend I had the unique experience of seeing "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" three times. It may not seem like such a big deal to hard core fans of the film. But the thing that made it interesting in my case was that for the first two of the three showings that I attended, I was not there as a member of the audience. Instead, I was working with one of the film committees. I was supposed to stand by the wall and direct anyone who wanted to get out during the show to the doors at the front of the theatre.

Before the show started I stood by the wall and watched the people come in. I'd seen the movie before, so I kind of knew what to expect. It didn't surprise me to see that some of the people were wearing costumes, dressed-up like the eccentric characters in the movie. I saw the paper bags they carried, filled with "props": rice to be thrown during the wedding scene, water guns to be fired during the rain scene, and toasted bread to be thrown when one of the characters proposed a toast at the dinner table.

My job wasn't hard work, but it was exhausting. The first show was at 9:30 p.m. Friday. After it, I hardly thought I could make it through the midnight show. The 9:30 crowd had been pretty mild and I'd had nothing much to do except watch the movie. And as anyone will tell you, the movie itself is pretty bad.

After the 9:30 audience left, when the midnight crowd started coming in, I leaned up against the wall and closed my eyes. I couldn't believe I had to watch the movie a second time in a period of five hours.

But I watched the crowd as well, and from the outside it looked crazy. I stood by the wall and scratched my head. The crowd shouted at the characters on the screen. When the "Time Warp" started, people crowded close to the stage and did the dance. At times, the air was full of rice, toast and playing cards which had been thrown by the people from their seats.

As I stood against the wall I wondered what the charm was. As I said, I had seen the film before — but only once. And in some respects the first time doesn't count. You don't know the lines the first time you see it. You don't know how to behave. You only hope that no one finds out you've never seen it before, because if they do they call you a "virgin" and direct the crowd in a chant to tease you for your "innocence": "Virgin! Virgin! Virgin!"

I was overwhelmed by the time the second show ended about 2 a.m. Saturday. I was glad it was over. By watching the crowd while I worked the Friday night shows, I had picked up quite a few lines that are shouted in response to the action of the movie. I had a pretty good idea of where the props fit into the film. But if someone had asked me to go to one of the Saturday night shows when I was leaving the Union Ballroom at 2:15 Saturday morning, I would have laughed at them.

Eric Becker

I guess it was a miracle I went back for a third show. A couple of friends suggested it, and I went along despite myself. I made it clear to them that I hated the movie. I warned them I wasn't sure I could sit through the whole thing again. I told them I might walk out, but I went along nevertheless.

But this time I didn't stand against the wall. This time I was a part of the audience. The night before had paid off, because now I knew what to do. I found myself clapping and shouting. I was in on the action, throwing rice and toast. And I found that, without meaning to, I had even started liking a few of the songs.

Like many, I'm afraid to sing out loud, even in a sing along. It's difficult for me to dance; somehow I can't quite let go. Even when I answer a question in class, I don't talk very loud. Yet, there I sat at the midnight show Saturday shouting with the audience at the characters on the screen. I had become a part of the collective personality the audience assumes in "The Rocky Horror Picture Show." And the release of my "self" in that audience was a surprising and unexpected high. I was involved, a part of it. The feeling was incredible!

But as incredible to me as my performance Saturday night was, how differently I perceived the movie when I was inside of the crowd. The movie must have been just as bad. The crowd was essentially the same, even when I stood outside it on Friday night. The components were the same. Only my position in the whole scheme was different.

But whereas involvement in the audience at "Rocky Horror" involves a certain submission to the crowd as a whole, it nevertheless requires participation on the part of the individual. One could sit there in the crowd and do nothing, I suppose, but not to any satisfying end.

This is where we can get stuck in our everyday lives. It's easy to sit in the back of the room during a class and just be there. I do it all the time. I sit in the crowd and do nothing. I listen to the lecture. I take my notes. But I seldom speak up, even when I'm not sure that I understand. Why don't I?

Maybe it's for the same reason I'm afraid to sing out loud, for the same reason I'm afraid to dance. Somehow I can't quite let go. But what do I expect to happen?

I can come up with a million reasons not to talk when I'm sitting in a class. But when I ask myself straight-out what I'm afraid of, I have no answer.

It seems as if we must sometimes express our individual personalities within larger collectives if we're ever to experience things in different ways. I could never have had the fun I had at "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" Saturday night if I'd guarded my "self" from the experience the audience offered. I may never learn as much as I am capable of learning if I don't start asking questions in class.

It's not a matter of sacrificing our personalities. It's a matter of sharing our personalities with each other. It's a way of expanding our perspectives and experiencing the different aspects of our lives in different ways. The situation may remain the same, but if our places within it change, the experiences that result can be rewarding.

I'm glad I went back to "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" for a third time last weekend. My memory of the whole experience is much more pleasant than it was after the Friday night shows. Sometimes a change of mind may not be necessary to see things in a different way. Sometimes a change of clothes may be enough.

Students should play role in their local government

How many times have you complained about your landlord not fixing things or the parking problem on campus? It's probably in the double digits. Have you ever taken it a step further and voiced your concern to someone who could make a difference? Probably not.

At times, it seems the student voice is one not heard by the government.

The government listens to war experts and economists, not students concerned with safe housing and transportation.

We can't make the war go away or balance the national budget, but we can make our voice heard locally.

One K-State student wants to be a such a voice for students.

Craig Raborn, junior in geography and student government cabinet member, is hoping to be the first student city commissioner.

If he makes it past the primary election Feb. 26, he will go on to the final election April 2.

Raborn would have the advantage of being a student and a city official responsible to student voters.

But he and every other city commission candidate can't voice the concerns of students who don't vote.

Students living off-campus are eligible to vote in city elections. Whether you vote for the student candidate or not, the important thing is to vote.

Off-campus students have the responsibility of being the voice for all students living on campus who don't have that opportunity.

By voting, students can be a part of the solution instead of just complaining about the problem.

Position scrutinized

Editor,

I am writing this letter to inform all students attending this University about the way in which part of their tuition is being allocated. Approximately $7 of your fees is being used to support the Educational Opportunity Fund (EOF). This money is used to benefit several organizations on campus. I am only concerned with the money given from EOF to student-parents as childships. This allows the student-parents who are eligible to attain proper care for their children while attending this University. Many of these students would not be able to attend the University without this funding.

The childships were not given exclusively to the KSU Child Development Center (CDC) this year, as they had been in the past. Some childships were distributed through the Office of Student Financial Assistance. This allowed the student-parents to choose their child care provider and not be bound to the center. Some students commute to campus from surrounding towns, some may have children that require specialized care and some are not happy with the CDC. This special allocation allowed those parents the freedom of choice.

I addressed the Child Development Center's Board of Directors about my concern of the new billing procedure and am not satisfied with their response. The new procedure makes all parents responsible for paying for child care during semester breaks, whether their child is there or not; it has not been that way in the past. Many parents do not need or want child care for those breaks. The CDC benefited many University families in the past by providing optional child care days, so that parents who needed care during those times could obtain it. This was one of the reasons I selected to enroll my son at the CDC. Child care centers that are not affiliated with the University do not have an obligation to provide this optional billing structure. K-State's CDC does because they cater strictly to the University.

I currently have a child at the CDC and am receiving a childship. I am concerned about the director, Mary Rita Spooner's position. One person cannot be everything to everyone all the time, and that is her job description. Recently she has come under direct scrutiny from me and others. After meeting with her, I realized it is not her specifically — instead it is the position itself that needs to be investigated. The task of getting a qualified director for the CDC was difficult because of the amount of work and responsibilities involved. The position needs to be re-evaluated so the director can function effectively for the center.

I don't believe that the center is effectively serving the needs of all the student-parents. The current plans are to return all childships to the CDC; they would be for use at the CDC exclusively. I am urging all students to voice your opinion to your senators; we as parents need the freedom to choose our child care providers. In order for every student-parent receiving a childship to have the freedom, all EOF childship funds must be allocated through the Office of Student Financial Assistance. Without your help, all parents receiving childships will be forced to either keep their children at the CDC or lose their childship. I called the billing department of the CDC to find out if the University benefits monetarily from the center, and the answer was no. The University does not make any profit from money collected from the center, so there is no reason anyone should be bound to the center; it should be their choice.

Bar not for study

Editor,

I have been a bartender for almost 20 years. Never once in all that time did anyone come into one of my bars to study. No one brought in so much as a newspaper, magazine or book. When people came into my bars, they were seeking companionship, not solitude. When you go to a bar, you are looking for people to talk to. When you want to read or study, you go to a library.

Union Station was built, not to replace a study area, but to provide a place to forget about your studies for awhile. If the K-State Union had wanted people to study, they would have left the Catskeller, right? I am really excited about the concept of the Union Station: no drinking, no smoking and great music. All the people who work here have a lot of fun; we want our customers to have fun, too.

If the Union Station was a study hall, then we would all be sitting around studying instead of making your drinks or preparing your food. Working at the Union Station is like not working at all. We get to meet a lot of people, we enjoy ourselves and we listen to a lot of good music. When we want to study, we go to the library.

Remember, the library was built for you, also.

Editor,

Last Tuesday, John Ulett, a disc jockey on a St. Louis radio station, played a mock emergency broadcast bulletin telling listeners that the United States was under a nuclear attack. He did this with no disclaimer that it was false. Needless to say, I'm sure more than one commuter was a little worried that day.

Ulett did this not as a joke but rather a political statement. He did it in response to the numerous calls he has received at the station that suggested that the United States use nuclear bombs on Iraq to end the war.

I think Ulett's actions bring up an important point. With all due respect to veterans and those on campus who have friends and loved ones serving in Operation Desert Storm, the death and destruction of war does not seem real to many Americans. When was the last time we had to worry about an enemy's bomb destroying our home, or fear for the safety of our family in our own nation? It is almost as if some see it as a game where the United States can "show off" its power and superiority.

No one knows how long this war will be. And no one knows what damage will be incurred before the goals of the United States are met. I just hope we all consider the all too real consequences of war on those involved. I can't imagine a life where I'd have to carry a gas mask wherever I went and would always need to know where the closest bomb shelter was.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Wives, mothers leave families to go to gulf

Persian Gulf War allows more men to see side of war not traditionally theirs

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Stereotypically, men go away to war, and women are left at home, but that isn't the case anymore. Operation Desert Storm has taken many wives and mothers to the desert of Saudi Arabia.

"Men leave wives and children all over the world," said Seath Miller, Manhattan resident whose wife, Renee, was deployed to the Persian Gulf as part of Operation Desert Storm. "I now see what they go through."

Renee left for the gulf in December with her unit, leaving her husband to take care of himself and their 4-month-old baby boy.

The Millers have been married for seven years, two of which Miller said they have spent apart due to the duties they have both had in the service. Renee is a transportation officer in the Big Red One and Seath is an Army Reservist.

Miller used to work nights as a licensed practical nurse. But when his wife was deployed, he quit his job to spend more time with the baby and provide adequate care for him.

Men leave wives and children all over the world. I now see what they go through.

—Seath Miller
Manhattan resident

Miller said he now spends his entire day with their son, and all his activities are planned around him.

His own recreational schedule has changed from playing racquetball, running and weight training to playing chess, reading books and watching CNN — things he can do at home.

"Everything has to focus on his majesty," he said, pointing at the baby.

Burn-out is something that

Miller said he is careful to avoid. He said when he feels like he's burning-out — spending too much time with the baby — he takes the baby to the sitter and goes running or does some other activity.

He said the hardest thing to deal with, though, is not the added responsibilities. It is the uncertainty of the situation and how long his wife will be gone.

"I wish I could change places with her," said Miller.

He tells his son, "Mommy can take everybody's place, but no one can take Mommy's place."

Operation Desert Storm left Ralph Joest, Manhattan resident, to care for his 15-month-old son alone, when his wife, Susan, was deployed to Saudi Arabia.

Joest, an Army reservist, is familiar with separation, but agreed with Miller that the uncertainty of how long his wife will be gone is the hardest part.

Children face doubts

Support groups help youth adjust to parents' absence

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

As many children see one or both parents go to the Persian Gulf, school districts must prepare to help them cope with doubts, fears and changes they may face.

The elementary schools in the Fort Riley and Junction City area are "full to the gills," said Charles Volland, communications coordinator for Unified School District #475.

The Eisenhower Elementary School in Junction City has about 140-150 children with parents who are in the military. About 100 of these children have one or both parents in the gulf, said Patty Paxton, secretary for the school.

In an attempt to help the children cope with problems they may encounter, she said faculty members have developed support groups for the students. The groups meet twice a week.

The meetings are open to all students and the children can just talk or ask any questions they have about the gulf situation, Paxton said.

Paxton said many of the fears or

It all depends on the child, as each one deals with the gulf crisis in their own way. You never know what they are holding in.

—Bill Orth elementary principal, high school counselor of St. Xavier's School

questions the children have come from watching television.

Paxton said she thinks the support groups are definitely helping the children.

The St. Xavier's School in Junction

City also has several children whose parents are in the military. In fact, due to military parents being transferred to Fort Riley, they have gained eight students, said Bill Orth, the elementary principal and high school counselor.

Orth said at St. Xavier's they were prepared to help children cope right from the beginning of the gulf situation.

Fort Riley counselors came in and explained to the staff how to deal with students' problems, Orth said.

As of now, he said, there is a low percentage of kids showing discomfort, and the school is handling the children on an individual basis.

"It all depends on the child, as each one deals with the gulf crisis in their own way," Orth said. "You never know what they are holding in."

Wildcats hand Sooners lopsided defeat

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Editor

Shoot 46 percent from the free throw line against the 23rd-ranked team in the country and you lose, right?

Wrong.

K-State, looking more like the Los Angeles Lakers did in their vintage years in the mid-80s than the poor-shooting bunch that lost its first five Big Eight games, routed Oklahoma 95-70 Tuesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

That's right, Billy Tubbs. The Wildcats flat out spanked your team, no questions asked.

"There's not much to say. We just got drilled, to say the least," said Tubbs, who absorbed his worst conference defeat as Sooner coach since his first year at the helm in Norman. In that first year — 1980-81 — Tubbs' teams suffered four Big Eight losses of 27 points or more.

K-State, 12-8 overall and 2-5 in the Big Eight, shot a sizzling 64 percent for the game. Included was a 73-percent explosion in the opening 20 minutes that set a rather joyous tone for what was to be an evening that left 12,540 deliriously happy fans taking two steps at a time as they bounced up the aisles toward the Bramlage exits.

The 73-percent showing set a Coliseum record for shooting percentage in a half.

The Wildcats hit 10 of their first 11 shots of the game and led 21-8 with 14:03 left in the opening 20 minutes.

Leading the charge during the period were guard Jeff Wires, forward Jean Derouillere and center Maurice Brittian.

In that 5:57 opening burst, Wires had eight points and Brittian and Derouillere four each.

Derouillere ended the night with 23 points, Wires 21 and Brittian 20. It was the first time since Feb. 14, 1976, that a trio of Wildcats had each scored 20-or-more points in the same outing.

Yep, not since Mike Evans, Chuckie Williams and Larry Dassic blitzed the Sooners in a K-State win had fans in these parts seen anything quite like what they witnessed Tuesday night.

"Our defense was as bad as you can possibly play defense in the first half," Tubbs said. "A good recreation team would have shot 63 percent against that defense — but maybe not 73 percent."

Tubbs' troops weren't playing a rec team. They were playing an inspired bunch.

The way the Wildcats blistered the nets left a smile on the face of Coach Dana Altman. Strategy really isn't necessary when everything you shoot finds nothing but nylon.

"(Good shooting) makes coaches look smart," Altman said. "It makes it look like we had it all figured out right from the start."

But coach, your players think they did have it figured out from the get-go.

"We came out real strong, hit the boards and never looked back," said Derouillere, who was 11-of-16 shooting. "Coach talked about not letting up in the second half, about not having another KU game."

After moving to a 47-36 lead at the half, K-State appeared in danger of letting another big lead slip away at home when Keke Hicks canned a 3-pointer with 10:07 left to play to make the score 67-60.

K-State, prior to the 11-0 Sooner spurt capped by Hicks' heroics, led by 18. A pair of Oklahoma misses from point-blank range following Hicks' bomb were very big.

Instead of the lead being cut to a very tenuous five, the misses appeared to let the wind out of the Sooner sails. The Wildcats ran off eight straight points — four by Derouillere, two by Wires and two by Brittian. Game over.

With the lead back to a comfortable 15, K-State kicked it into cruise control. The result was a margin of defeat for OU that even exceeded the 22-point shellacking the Sooners, 15-7 and 4-4, took at the hands of No. 2 Arkansas earlier this year.

"I think the pace was the same pace we've played all year. We just shot it better," Altman said of his team's exploits from the field.

He obviously wasn't talking about the 11-of-24 showing from the free throw stripe.

But not many people were Tuesday night. Why dwell on the negative on a night filled with the most positives seen in these parts in a long time.

Brittian emerges as force in big 'Cat home triumph

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

Maurice Brittian got the ball, made the Sooners of Oklahoma pay and made their big men want to forget they even made the journey into Wildcat country and Bramlage Coliseum Tuesday night.

Brittian was white hot almost every time his hands touched the ball. A jumper here and a hook shot there led to his best outing of the season in K-State's second straight victory over Oklahoma in Manhattan, 95-70.

"Sunday and Monday he really practiced hard, really practiced well ... (K-State assistant coach) Ken Turner said before the game, 'Mo's going to have a big one,'" K-State Coach Dana Altman said. "Our guys are pretty predictable, they play like they practice. This was by far Mo's best effort, and it's really good to see him play like that."

In case you missed the contest, Brittian, who is averaging only four field goal attempts in Big Eight games, nailed 10-of-13 shots en route to a 20-point outburst.

Add his 10 boards, four more than his average, and you have a Player-of-the-Week type of performance.

"I just felt comfortable while I was out there and picking my shots," Brittian said. "The defense was pretty good, but I just choose my shots at the right time."

Choosing the shots at the right time was part of his success, but then some of that success should also be attributed to the rest of the K-State team. The Wildcats dumbfounded the Sooners defense with a arsenal of weapons to help open the middle for Brittian.

Jean Derouillere and Jeff Wires played the biggest part of opening the lane with 23 and 21 points respectively.

It was obvious from the opening tip-off that Brittian and the Wildcats were hungry for their second conference victory. Brittian got his first couple of shots to fall with two hooks to build much needed confidence, and that was all he required.

"I was trying to play for myself and get my confidence up. I've been working on my hook shot and coach has been trying to get me to work on it in practice," Brittian said. "It just felt good for me tonight."

But after those first two hook shots came Brittian's biggest crowd pleaser of all. At the 11:10 mark in the first half Brittian got a thunderous dunk, putting the 'Cats up 25-12, and whipping the 12,540 in attendance to a deafening frenzy.

"I was more active and more hungry for the ball. In that type of way it was a lot better game for me," he said.

The Brittian outburst eclipsed his previous season high of 12 points, which he had in three different games, and marked only his second double-double of the season. He had 12 points and 11 bounds in a 98-44 win over Northwest Missouri State.

The change was as much of a relief for Brittian as it was for the fans. It help him relieve the pressures he has been putting on himself on the offensive side of the hardwood.

"I have been trying to work on my offense a lot more the last couple of weeks, and it paid off for me tonight," Brittian said. "I was kind of putting pressure on myself. It feels good to come off a couple of losses before we beat Colorado and get a couple of Big Eight wins."

The game also produced a entirely different team in the eyes of Altman. The steady force of Derouillere and Wires combined with Brittian on the inside led to K-State scoring 19 more points than its average.

"When Mo Brittian steps up and plays like that, it really makes us a lot different team. Tonight was definitely the best I have ever seen him play," Altman said. "I don't know what took him so long, but it sure is great to see him play that way."

Lady Cats to face Lady Sooners

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

It all started with an 86-75 win over the Oklahoma Lady Sooners Jan. 23 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Going into that game, the Lady Cats were in a four-way tie for first place in the Big Eight Conference.

Now they have won four straight conference match-ups and are in a two-way tie with Oklahoma State atop the conference standings.

Tonight the Lady Cats, 6-2 in Big Eight play, will try to add the Lady Sooners, 2-6, to their winning streak, again.

Oklahoma coach Gary Hudson said he was weary of playing the Lady Cats due to the fact that the Lady Sooners have played inconsistently this season.

"Our team has been up and down all season. I never know what to expect from them," he said. "K-State is a big favorite in the game. They are a very well-coached team."

K-State leads the series against Oklahoma 15-7. The series in Norman is currently tied 4-4, although K-State has won the last two games in Lloyd Noble Center.

The game against the Lady Sooners will be the first of two road games for the Lady Cats this week. The Lady Cats have won their last two conference road games, against Missouri and Kansas, and are currently 3-1 while visiting conference opponents' home courts.

Two Lady Cat seniors, Nadira Hazim and Diana Miller, continue to make a strong bid for Big Eight Player-of-the-Year honors.

Hazim has scored 20-or-more points in seven consecutive games to bring her season average to 18.7 points per game.

Miller continues to lead the Big Eight in scoring with 19.3 points per game.

Hudson expressed his respect for these two Lady Cat players.

"Kansas State has two of the best individuals in the conference in Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim," he said.

He indicated the difficulties Miller and Hazim could give the Lady Cats. ■ See LADY CATS, Page 10

Big East football league formed

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — The 30-year dream of an Eastern football league became reality Tuesday with creation of another Big East conference.

Athletic directors at eight proud football independents saw a future of nightmarish schedules, dominant leagues and dwindling TV exposure.

"I think that the climate this time around almost forced the issue," Syracuse athletic director Jake Crouthamel said. "We're talking about the integrity of the schedule and the need to play games."

"When you put it in that context, you get a little shaky-kneed."

Independents, said Rutgers athletic director Fred Gruninger, became an endangered species.

Syracuse, Boston College, Miami of Florida and Pittsburgh, already Big East basketball members, will play Rutgers, Temple, West Virginia and Virginia Tech beginning this fall in the new football conference.

Laura Palmer lives on at K-State

Despite popular belief on Saturday night television, Laura Palmer is alive and well at K-State. Palmer, namesake of murdered Twin Peaks character, is a senior in biology.

Senior in biology shares name with Twin Peaks character, says brush with fame fun for friends

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

Laura Palmer is alive. No, she didn't return from the afterlife in the form of a dancing dwarf, she's a senior in biology living in Goodnow Hall. Sound strange? Read on.

Laura Palmer was the name of a character on the series Twin Peaks. This superstitious soap opera has everything from giants speaking within people's visions to a woman who communicates with a log.

When the show aired on ABC last spring, the first scene was Laura Palmer's body being dragged from the water. The plot has since revolved around finding her killer and other strange phenomena that mere words cannot explain.

K-State's Palmer was sitting in her residence hall room studying when she saw the first episode.

"I couldn't believe it was my name, I have such a boring name," she said. "I just sat there watching the TV and didn't get any studying done."

A few episodes later, a tombstone with the name Laura Palmer appeared on her door. Friends came over and began dividing up her belongings — saying she wouldn't be needing anything if she was dead.

"I get a lot of kidding, but it's all in good nature," Palmer said. She said she watches Twin Peaks and likes its eeriness.

Rosanna Sparks, sophomore in accounting and a friend of Palmer's, laughs as she describes Palmer.

"She's not at all like the Laura Palmer on the show," Sparks said, "but she is off the beaten path."

People think they are being original when they respond to her name with a typical Twin Peaks joke, Palmer said. Now when she writes a check or is introduced she said she follows with, "Yes, I am alive."

Palmer said her friends find it odd when she can second guess the producers.

"I knew all along that Daddy was my murderer," she said. Palmer has a habit of speaking about the show in first person. Now, even her parents joke about it.

"When my father calls, he always says, 'Hi, this is your murderer,'" Palmer said.

Having the same name as a soap opera character has made this Laura Palmer's life interesting to say the least.

"At least people remember my name," she said.

As a mini-celebrity, Palmer said she has coped well with the constant jokes, and even the funeral scene.

"Yes I am alive and well and living in the Heartland of America," Palmer said.

Brick streets still used in Manhattan

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan may not be home to the yellow brick road, but it is home to red brick streets.

Some of these brick streets are Juliette Avenue, Fairchild Avenue and the south part of Delaware Avenue, said Will Jensen, street superintendent for Manhattan. There are other brick streets, but they have been covered with asphalt.

Bruce McCallum, director of public works for Manhattan, said Juliette Avenue is the only original brick street left. They have tried to keep it original so it can retain its character, he said.

The reason some of the brick streets were covered with asphalt, McCallum said, is because of the time and costs of repairs.

"It is almost two times as expensive to repair the brick streets," he said. "Repairing the brick streets is very labor-intensive, as all the work must be done by hand. From an economic standpoint, it was easier to cover them up."

What often needs repairing is the layer under the bricks, Jensen said. This consists of one to two inches of sand and topped by six inches of concrete. This can break up and need to be replaced.

Besides being expensive to repair, Jensen said the brick streets tend to get slick quicker in the winter. To handle this, they keep a closer eye on them and may use more salt and sand on the ice.

The future of the remaining brick streets depends on how they wear, Jensen said. They get a few complaints about them.

"There are some who want to keep them, and some who don't because they are noisy," he said.

Forum will address war in gulf, fairness, accuracy of coverage

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

Providing a means for public discussion about the Persian Gulf War and its media coverage is the purpose of a forum scheduled for tonight, said Robert Daly, forum moderator and associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

"We're not there to pontificate, or proselytize, or propagandize," Daly said. "We're there to try to explain what happened, how it happened, and then we'll talk about the media's involvement."

The forum, titled "Censorship, Propaganda and Live TV: The Press, the Military and the War in the Gulf," is sponsored by the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. in Kedzie Hall 106. Admission is free and open to the public.

The purpose of the panel, Daly said, is "to listen to what the people have to say. We will only try to put some framework about it."

The forum will begin with two videotapes produced by David MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and mass communications. One of the tapes shows the coverage of the war's events, beginning with the first bulletins, and the other of the media's reporting about the media coverage, he said.

MacFarland spent about 30 hours assembling the two tapes which will provide a sort of platform of knowledge to begin the discussion, Daly said. MacFarland will also discuss the professionalism of television reporting about the war.

Cheering considered sport

Supporting athletic teams requires training, preparation

Toss-to-hands, liberty, purdue, toe-touch and round-off back handspring-back tuck. These may not mean anything to the thousands of fans at Bramlage Coliseum during a basketball game, however, these are among the many stunts cheerleaders and yell-leaders do at every game.

Because of the reputation cheerleading has had in the past, many people may think it is very simple, when it is quite difficult. In fact, cheerleading is beginning to gain recognition as a sport.

"I think it is a sport. You have to have athletic ability to cheer. We compete against other squads just like every other sport. We want to be the best squad in the Big Eight, if not the whole country," said Kurt Stoner, varsity yell-leader.

The cheerleaders and yell-leaders do more than go to the games and cheer. They have practices and additional ones as needed.

"There's a lot you have to do outside of cheering. The guys have to go to the gym and lift weights, run, do gymnastics and really keep in shape," said Stoner.

The year starts off with tryouts, which are in April. Tryouts consist of similar things for men and women.

The men have to learn a routine to the fight song, execute various stunts with a partner and tumble. They must also develop an overall attitude and personality, said Stoner. The women have the same requirements, and a dance to perform as well.

Judges for tryouts select varsity squads of seven men and women each. After the squads are chosen, practices begin.

"We practice every weekday for two to two-and-a-half hours. We work on game material, building pyramids and aim for crowd participation," said Jill Washington, varsity cheerleader.

The squad said they hope to compete nationally again this year. They have to send in a tape of their performances to the Universal Cheerleading Association.

"Our practices get more difficult when we train for the national competition. We work for perfection and precision. We do harder stunts. The whole purpose of the practice is different," said Washington.

Lafene helps minorities

Editor's Note: This is the second in a series of three reports on the various support groups offered by University Counseling Services at Lafene Health Center.

Imagine being a white student walking across campus and seeing only black faces.

The faces, music and culture are familiar — they're just not a part of the usual routine. Pretty soon, one wants to do comfortable, familiar things.

Being surrounded by someone else's culture is a reality for black and international students at K-State. But now they have a place to be themselves with Tina Richardson.

Richardson, senior staff psychologist at University Counseling Services, has started support groups for students who find themselves in the minority among K-State's predominantly white student population.

Often universities are unable to offer specialized minority support groups because they lack minority counselors or staff with the interest and expertise to do so, Richardson said.

Non-traditional students juggle family, class

PAULA BERGLUND
Collegian Reporter

The non-traditional student population made up 26 percent of the total enrollment in the 1990 fall semester. Many of these students are juggling school, work and families.

Non-traditional students are furthering their education for various reasons.

Lisa Tomlin, senior in fine arts, decided to continue her education after sitting out for seven years.

"The poor economy sent my husband, Howard, back to school. It looked like fun, so after a year I decided to go back," Tomlin said.

Maribeth Caldwell, junior in social work, has always planned on finishing her education. While she was a freshman, Maribeth's husband, Fred, was in the military and was transferred to Germany.

Caldwell went to Germany with her husband, but was unable to finish college. After returning to the United States, she enrolled the next semester.

Child care is another concern of the non-traditional student. The KSU Child Care Cooperative is used by many students. The center provides care for children of students, faculty and staff. More than half of the center's enrollment is children of students.

One child care program offered by the center is "flexicare." This program allows a child to attend day care for part of a day and/or part of a week, instead of every day, all day. The "flexicare" program also allows the parent to pay for the exact amount of time the child is in day care.

Caldwell said she uses the "flexicare" program. She said she and her husband try to schedule their classes in the morning so their son is only in day care half a day.

"Being in day care all day is too stressful for my son and for me," said Caldwell.

Finding day care for their two children was not a problem for Howard and Lisa Tomlin.

"We planned ahead to make a smooth transition," said Lisa Tomlin. Before coming to K-State, the Tomlins filled out all the necessary papers for child care at the center. She said planning ahead made their move to Manhattan easier.

Being non-traditional students has enhanced their children's lives, Tomlin said, and being in a college town offers better child care than her children might have received before their move.

Tomlin also said her children are benefiting from the different cultures they are exposed to at the center.

All marriages deal with pressure. For the non-traditional student who is married, the pressure may be greater.

"Howard and I got married at a young age and grew up together," Tomlin said. "We make our schedules so they work together. If Howard has a heavy schedule, I try to make mine light."

School has definitely affected her marriage, said Maribeth Caldwell. After returning from Germany, Fred Caldwell was still in the military.

"I felt that when my husband was home I needed to spend time with him, not studying."

Helping others goal of peers

ANNE TATUM
Collegian Reporter

Learning skills seminar leaders aren't just teachers, they are fellow students.

Judy Lynch, associate director of student services, said when hiring a study skills teacher she looks for someone who not only has good academic standing but also possesses good people skills.

"A student who is applying to be a study skills leader needs to have a 3.0 grade point average, or better, and have done well in social science and math courses," she said. "The student must also be good in helping relationships — so good people skills are needed too."

Michelle Moon, senior in psychology, said she enjoyed helping other students in her job as a study skills leader.

"I felt like I had a lot to give the students," Moon said.

Moon said she did not see herself as a teacher but as more of a mentor to the students.

Ira Bolden, senior in electrical engineering and study skills leader for six semesters, said he continued to do it because he realized his help makes a difference to the students in the class.

"It was the second semester I taught, and I was reading through the papers I have the class write about what they think it takes to be a successful student, there were all kinds of grammatical errors in all the papers — they were bad," Bolden said.

—Michelle Moon
senior in psychology

"There were all kinds of grammatical errors in all the papers — they were bad."

"The neat thing was they had to turn another paper in at the end of the semester," he said. "You could really see the difference, and I knew I had helped them make the difference."

Each section of the study skills classes is set up differently. The classes focus on study skills for sociology, psychology and math courses. One day a week is devoted to a study skills lab and the other two days are split — some students go to a math lab and others go to a social science lab.

Lynch said the class is mainly targeted to first-semester freshmen, those with specifically low ACT scores or those who have been out of school for a while.

Moon and Bolden said they were required to attend class with the students so they would be better prepared to answer questions about the lecture.

"We were required to have two blocks of office hours and we attended their lectures with them, plus we had the actual class," Moon said.

Students who teach study skills are paid $750 per semester, which equals about $5 per hour.

Lynch said there are plenty of applicants for the teaching positions. There were about 60 applicants last spring, of which 13 were chosen to teach last fall.

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

Despite these differences, the three generally agree on the issues facing the community. Among these are safe housing, the economic future of Manhattan and creating a more participatory local government. In essence, the issues involve retaining the quality of life in Manhattan. Competent city management in the past is the reason Manhattan is not faced with any burning issues, Cooper said.

"The city has been managed well in the past," Cooper said. "We're building on a very good base."

Dubois said Manhattan is just starting to feel the economic implications of the absence of the more than 12,000 soldiers from Fort Riley stationed in the Middle East. Since long-term effects will not surface for several years, the situation will have to be monitored closely.

Safe housing is a problem that has been haunting Manhattan for over 20 years, Dubois said.

"I went to school here in 1968, and we had sub-standard housing," Dubois said. "Now it's 1991, and we still have sub-standard housing."

He said the commission has been looking at an inspection program for almost two years. Although some good came from this, no workable system could be found. Dubois said he would push the commission to seek a solution to the problem.

Over the past four years, Manhattan has suffered an 800 percent increase in the cost of trash collection, Dubois said. The escalating costs will be a problem for every urban city in the future.

Dubois said these topics are just a few that might surface over the course of the next few years.

"I don't feel any of these issues are either/or," Dubois said. "They're all interrelated."

Cooper agreed that no one issue is in the forefront, but rather a group of topics leads the way. A citywide transportation system and investments in Aggieville were among those listed by Cooper.

Auditors scrutinize K-State funding

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

The need to cut over $100 million out of the state budget has brought the Margin of Excellence program under scrutiny by state auditors.

The audit was requested by Sen. Eric Yost, D-Wichita, and Monday the Legislative Post-Audit Committee voted unanimously for the audit. It is projected to take seven weeks.

Rep. Bill Roy Jr., D-Topeka and member of Legislative Post-Audit Committee, said the audit will do an overview of all regent schools but will examine K-State and Wichita State more closely.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said the two schools were chosen because they are representative of other Kansas Board of Regents schools. K-State is a campus university with a large extension program, and Wichita State is more of a commuter college with most students attending part-time.

Roy said the audit will look at the mission statements of each regent school to determine if money is being allocated to meet the needs of those statements in such areas as percentages of funds spent on faculty and administrative salaries and program expansion versus implementation of new programs.

In fiscal year 1989, the regent schools received a total of $11.9 million. It was increased to $17 million in 1990, and $17 million was requested again for 1991, which was to be the third and final year of the MOE program, Sue Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said. The money was not received for 1991, so the request for the final year of funding is being considered for 1992.

K-State received $1.6 million for salaries and $1.4 million in program improvements in 1989 and $2 million for salaries and $1.8 million in program improvements in 1990, she said. The University has requested $2.5 million for salaries and $1 million in program improvements for 1992.

Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said he is optimistic about the audit.

"My general feeling is that those funds are critical not only to the regents system but the entire state of Kansas," he said. "Those funds go to a higher quality of life in the state of Kansas, and any look at those funds will find they've been an outstanding investment to the state. It can withstand any scrutiny," Glasscock said.

The Legislature will consider the MOE after the auditors submit their findings. Stanley Koplik, executive director of the regents, said the delay will not be a problem.

"There will be plenty of time to make a decision. Usually this type of decision is made at the end of session," he said.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, has received stuffed animals from all over the world, so many he is able to fill an office corner. He has been receiving them for five years now.

BEAR MOUNTAIN

Biology director collects stuffed animals

KELLY BERG
Campus Editor

There's a desk, some chairs, and books — your typical instructor's office — until you see the mountain of teddy bears arranged in the corner.

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, started collecting stuffed animals about five years ago by accident.

It all started, Johnson said, when a picture of him holding a stuffed animal was published in the K-Stater magazine. The next thing he knew, he was getting stuffed animals from everyone — friends, relatives, associates and former students.

"Sometimes I don't even know where they come from," he said. "Some of them just come through the mail with no name attached."

But a lot of them come a name and a story.

"That one came all the way from Korea," Johnson said, pointing at a bear with brownish-gray fur.

As he continued with the story, he said a former associate and longtime friend, Helen Brockman, had made the suggestion to one of her former students, Gloria Kirchoff, to give Johnson one of the bears she designed for Hallmark.

She did even better than that, Brockman said. Kirchoff gave him one of the prototypes.

"She gave him one of the original ones that she designed and made herself," Brockman said. "I think she got him the ultimate bear, and he seemed to like it fine."

Johnson said he did. "I think I had one of those bears before they were even on the market for sale," he said with a smile. The next bear Johnson pointed out was a small yellow one given by a former biology student.

It was one a student had given her father. When her father died, she gave it to Johnson to add to his collection because she said she wanted to know it had company, Johnson said.

He then pointed to a stuffed bear wearing a pin-striped suit.

"This is the guy that started it all," he said, smiling.

"And this guy right here," he said, pointing to a bear in a camouflage suit, "is the latest addition. He's a bear-trouper."

He said it came from Fort Stuart, Ga., where his son-in-law is stationed.

"Having the bears is good psychology for the office," he said, with a grin. "It's really hard to get angry in this office. They are always back there in the corner smiling."

Johnson said he doesn't know exactly why people send him the stuffed bears, but, he joked, they don't eat much and are really smart. "They've all taken all the biology courses we offer," he said. "That makes them pretty smart for bears."

But, Brockman has a theory of her own about why he gets the bears from all over the world.

"Terry's a very sweet man and a great friend to many," she said.

But, maybe it's as simple as Johnson's wife's reason, 30 years ago, for giving him the Mickey Mouse watch he still wears today.

"My wife gave the watch to me to remind me of my station in life," he said, grinning. "It's hard to get a big head while wearing a Mickey Mouse watch."

State population increases

Census results used to anticipate land use, allocation

PAUL NOEL
Staff Reporter

Population figures released by the United States Census Bureau in late January show Manhattan grew slightly during the 1980s.

According to the 1990 census, there are 2,477,574 people living in Kansas. However, it does not become official until July 1991 when the time to send corrections to the bureau expires.

Monty Wedel, director of planning and special projects in Manhattan, said the census is used in land-use planning and population projects.

"We develop a population projection and figure how much residential land will be needed and where it should be," he said. "We also anticipate commercial and industrial land."

According to the census, Manhattan's population is 37,712, which is an increase of less than 4,000 from the 1980 census. However, that figure will decrease after adjustments for students have been made.

John Reinhart, press secretary to the Kansas Secretary of State, said the Secretary's office will remove students and military personnel who do not claim Kansas as their permanent address.

"The adjustment won't affect how much money the county receives," Reinhart said. "It does affect the apportionment of House representatives in the districts."

Students are counted in the town they claim as their permanent address, he said.

The U.S. census is conducted every 10 years. But, a Kansas census was taken every year until 1988 when the state constitution was amended so the census did not have to be taken every year, said Brad Bryant, census director.

"The yearly census was known as the Ag. Census," Bryant said.

Riley County census figures

Although Riley County gained more than 3,500 people in the past 10 years, only two of five towns gained residents. Manhattan was the big winner with more than 5,000 new residents. Figures are based on 1990 figures vs. 1980 figures.

Union Station puts off recycling programs

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

In the fiscal year 1989-90, K-State contributed about 5800 cubic yards of waste to a landfill, for which the University paid $54,000.

About 290 cubic yards, or 5 percent, was produced by plastic utensils, said Al Seely, manager of campus services.

Student body president elections and recycling activities in several departments have recently shown there is a major interest in environmental issues on campus.

Some campus businesses, however, still use non-biodegradable products and do not recycle all possible products.

The nachos and tacos in the Union Station are served in plastic bowls, with plastic knives and forks. And the non-alcoholic daiquiris are served in long-stemmed glasses. Many of the soft drinks are served in Styrofoam cups.

Styrofoam cups are not yet biodegradable.

"Styrofoam is a porous, inert polystyrene molecule," explained John Schlup, associate professor of chemical engineering.

"You can shred it, but you cannot make another coffee cup out of it," he said.

Also, disposable plastic utensils, which are used in the Union, cannot be recycled and reused for food products.

Only polyethylene can be transformed, said Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's Recycling, but for health reasons it must not be used for food products again.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, introduced a recent Senate bill which requires labeling of plastic bottles and containers with the basic plastic resin used to produce it.

"We don't have the facilities in our operation system to do dishes," said Union Station Manager Teto Henderson. "I've got only one dishwasher."

"We thought about that and, on occasion, we will be using knives and silverware and plates and stuff, but from a cost standpoint and from a business standpoint, we use the Union plastic," he said.

"We are still too new, we do not know yet what kind of business we're going to have," Henderson said. "And, of course, the volume of the business would dictate how many dishwashers you'll need, how much more electricity, energy and water."

"There are still a lot of things we're not sure about, obviously, and this is probably one of those," he said. "More research needs to be done."

The Union Station recycles only paper products for which it joins the Union recycling project, Henderson said. But, there are no facilities for further separation of aluminum cans, organic material and plastic from the rest of the waste.

Raymond Kowalczewski, student director of SAVE, recalled an initiative to collect Styrofoam cups in the Union last year.

"The Union did not really give that a chance to get it going. They need to educate people," he said.

Union employees push drinking out of glasses instead of the plastic foam cups, said Cynthia Schmidt, student manager of the Union.

"I personally would like to eliminate the Styrofoam cups — I only use the glass mugs or refills — and get

Riley County recycler offers newspaper as straw substitute

HOPE SWARTZ
Collegian Reporter

The old idea of putting newspapers in the bottom of birdcages has just become a 50-ton-per-month business.

Howie's Recycling of Manhattan is working in cooperation with Riley County to use recycled newspaper as a straw substitute in lining barn stalls.

Howard Wilson, owner of the recycling center, said he can't keep up with the demand for the bales. He's already had to create a waiting list, which currently has requests for over 400 bales. His present rate of recycling is a semi load every two weeks.

"Right now we're giving it away," Wilson said. "But, after we develop a market for it, we hope to start getting our money back for our expenses. We'll probably have to start charging at least a dollar."

The paper is chopped into pieces and is fed into a John Deere baler, he rid of the plastic utensils," Schmidt said.

The problem is that everybody is in a hurry and wants convenience. Everything is so overpackaged, but nobody cares, she said.

Bridget Murphy, junior in sociology, said she cares.

"Basically I was disappointed to see that they serve the things out of Styrofoam, and I think on a college campus, where people are aware of the environmental issues, they should have taken more consideration on it," she said.

Angie Lacey, senior in apparel design, also said she is against too much plastic foam on campus.

"The one time I have been there (Union Station), my friend and I noticed they were using this Styrofoam, and we thought that was kind of odd," she said.

Henderson said he is open for changes, but sets other priorities.

"We've got to get started on our feet before we can start getting involved in those types of things," he said.

A more finely shredded version of what Wilson is making has been used in the greyhound dog industry for at least 10 years. But, it is more expensive to produce. Since there is already an established market, it can also be sold at a higher price.

"Our primary objective is to get rid of it and keep recycling alive," Wedel said.

The end result is a 60-pound bale that looks like a standard hay bale. Farmers are able to use it just as they would straw.

Wilson said it makes an excellent mulch when combined with manure so the end result is recyclable too.

"Working with the county was a mutual agreement. They had the idea, and I had the paper supply," Wilson said.

Monty Wedel, county planner, said the concept is not an original

6-year-old girl barred from contests

GRAND ISLAND, N.Y. (AP) — A 6-year-old girl has been barred from beauty pageants and baton-twirling contests because her birth certificate says she's a boy.

Whoever filled out Dominique Crocitto's birth certificate at the San Diego hospital where she was born, erroneously typed in male, authorities said.

The mistake was caught by a Niagara Falls marching and twirling studio, a business that teaches baton twirling and organizes contests.

Dominique's mother, Sue Crocitto, said the studio called her Tuesday to tell her Dominique might be disqualified from a contest Sunday because her birth certificate says she's a male.

"You don't have two boys, you have three boys now, Mommy," she told her mother.

Accidental gas explosion kills 3

GREENDALE, Wis. (AP) — A construction accident Tuesday ignited a natural gas explosion that crumbled an apartment building for senior citizens. Three residents were killed, and six others were injured, authorities said.

Fire chief Arnold Helling said construction workers rushed to the aid of residents in the eight-unit apartment building after they struck the gas line, touching off a series of blasts.

A witness said a series of explosions beginning at about 8 a.m. leveled about half the apartment building, which was used mainly to house senior citizens in Greendale, a suburb southwest of Milwaukee.

Frank Kritter said fire engulfed the complex within a few minutes of the blast, and some elderly residents became trapped.

Arsenio Hall to sue pizza shop

CLEVELAND (AP) — Syndicated TV talk show host Arsenio Hall is suing a pizza shop in his hometown of Cleveland for allegedly using his name without his permission.

Hall filed a lawsuit Tuesday in U.S. District Court against Arsenio's Pizza Inc. of Cleveland and its owners, Mazan Rabah and Steven Fenker, also known as John W. Fenker.

Hall asked the court to order the company to stop using his name and asked for all profits from the business and unspecified damages.

"Hall made it big, and here we are trying to seek out a little business. I think it's wrong what he's doing," Rabah said.

Rabah said he felt the company had the right to use the name it wants.

Swindle victims to get back money

TOPEKA (AP) — Kansas investors victimized in the Culture Farms Inc. swindle will get back 21.7 cents on the dollar, from money kept in escrow by a court-appointed receiver.

In 1984 and 1985, the Lawrence-based Culture Farms operation sold homegrown milk cultures, allegedly for resale to the cosmetics industry. But authorities say there was never a market, and in 1985 the Kansas securities commissioner ordered the companies to stop doing business in the state.

The order was later affirmed by Shawnee County District Judge James Buchele and the Kansas Supreme Court, and ultimately 12 people were convicted of federal mail fraud and conspiracy charges.

Buchele had ordered Culture Farms' Las Vegas affiliate, Activator Supply Co., to post a nearly $1 million bond while the matter was in dispute, and the money has been in escrow ever since.

Don Paxson, a court-appointed receiver, identified 931 Kansas victims who had been caught in the Culture Farms scheme.

B-1B Bombers to resume missions

OFFUTT AIR FORCE BASE, Neb. (AP) — B-1B bombers, grounded for nearly two months because of engine failures on two planes, will resume flight training missions, according to Gen. Lee Butler, commander in chief of the Strategic Air Command.

Training flights of the strategic bombers were suspended Dec. 19, 1990, after two planes experienced engine failure.

The grounding did not affect the planes' primary mission to provide deterrence against nuclear war, Butler said. Aircraft on strategic alert were ready to fly if directed, he said.

In fact, Butler said, the B-1Bs are serving an increased nuclear role to cover the alert tasks normally assigned to a portion of SAC's B-52 bombers, which are serving conventional roles in the Persian Gulf War.

The engine failures originated in a fan-blade assembly. SAC worked with the Air Force Logistics Command and General Electric, the engines' manufacturer, to try to resolve the problem.

A new fan blade retaining ring will be installed in the entire B-1B fleet and all spare engines as soon as possible, Butler said.

SAC's B-1Bs are based at Dyess Air Force Base, Texas, McConnell Air Force Base, Ellsworth Air Force Base, S.D., and Grand Forks Air Force Base, N.D.

The first engine failure occurred Oct. 4, 1990, when a B-1B at McConnell Air Force Base was climbing after low-level training in Colorado. The second incident on Dec. 19, involved a bomber at Dyess Air Force Base that was practicing landing approaches. Both planes landed safely.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said the money from the Transportation Department would be a significant boost for Kansas aviation.

Butler conducts study of young, black females

SUZANNE BROWN
Collegian Reporter

Editor's Note: In recognition of Black History Month, the Collegian will present a personality profile of a black faculty member every Thursday in February.

A photograph of a young, black girl hangs on the door to the office. Inside is a woman who has conducted research focused on young, black females.

"This is a population that stands between the juncture invisibly because they are consistently called black, or one of the girls," said Anne Butler, assistant dean and director for educational support services. "And who, because of occupying this status, is quite different than other gender groupings. I found a special interest in that they warrant study and investigation."

"That photo is a reflection of what I'm interested in from academic research points," said Butler, who is beginning her 14th year at K-State. Butler grew up in the small town of Stanford, Ky.

"It was a county seat and had a rich historical connection to the community," she said. "I am deeply rooted in the country, and I was very aware of what my ancestors had contributed. I grew up expecting a lot from America."

"I was a product of a segregated school system until my sophomore year of high school. I then watched the early developments of the civil rights movement and the actions taken to dismantle such segregation. I came of age in the 60s, and I had a lot of questioning on the ideals of America and its practices."

Butler earned a bachelor's degree at Eastern Kentucky University and continued her education at K-State, receiving a master's degree and a doctorate.

"I have chosen to spend my life addressing those contradictions among American ideals and its practices. I also have a strong interest in education and educational institutions," said Butler.

Upon moving to Manhattan in 1970, her first seven years were spent working for the city, directing the Douglass Community Center, a division of the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

The center is a neighborhood community gathering place that provides recreational, educational and social activities for the residents in the south part of Manhattan.

Butler then spent five years working with Manhattan Head Start as a teacher and educational coordinator designing and implementing pre-school activities.

In 1977, Butler acted as a graduate assistant in the new students unit and had enrollment and orientation duties. She then moved on to a part-time position with the Office of Minority Affairs. Butler acted as an outreach counselor.

"Basically, I assisted with recruiting students of color and was working on increasing the number of students of color in certain areas of the university," Butler said.

She was specifically involved in trying to increase the number of students of color in the College of Veterinary Medicine. Butler would visit high schools and junior high schools in areas such as Kansas City and Topeka and inform students of the options and career choices at K-State.

"This evolved into a full-time position that grew to include a focus on programs of an academic nature," Butler said. "I was involved with providing symposiums and guest speakers of interest to particular groups."

In 1982, Butler began directing an educational opportunity center program that later merged with a federally funded special services grant.

This was directed toward the underrepresentation of students of low income, first generation and physically limited background. This is what Butler is currently involved in and the program has now grown to include an all-University tutoring center. Any students with academic needs may seek assistance from this center, which is in Holton Hall.

Butler also serves as the adviser for the Ebony Theatre Co.

Continually, Butler is seeking to develop programs designed to assist students of color to become full participants in the University.

Last fall, she designed an orientation class for students of color. This was essentially a section of the Group Life Seminar. In the eight weeks of the course, students were accustomed to the understanding of their history and how other people had achieved leadership roles.

"Part of the course was designed to help students develop research skills," Butler said. "I treated the course as the starting of their professional lives."

"There are only a handful of African-American administrators and faculty (at K-State), and even fewer Hispanic and even fewer American Indians."

In the spring of 1990, Butler co-facilitated a workshop for student government leaders addressing multi-cultural diversity and how one prepares for leadership. She said she was encouraged to see that students realized what faced them in relation to this issue.

Butler sees the future of K-State lying in the acquisition and management of resources.

"We are in a recession, and have an economy that has been limited for the last 8-10 years," she said. "Part of the agenda is going to call for finding ways to make educational institutions a priority with the Legislature and the public."

Butler said she was very impressed by President Jon Wefald's campaign concerning cultural diversity.

"In the past 10 years, efforts at reforming the institution have been from the bottom-up," she said. "To see the president take the reins and improve from the top-down is very encouraging."

Butler said she sees the most pressing problems facing blacks today to be the lack of opportunity to participate in the economic mainstream.

Panel reviews war news

Military, media disagree on openness of information

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

The relationship between news-gathering organizations and the military in the Persian Gulf War is one of constant tension caused by their competing interests, Richard Nelson, professor of journalism and mass communications, said at a Wednesday night forum on media coverage of the war.

"The conflict is going to be one of continuous tension," Nelson said to 75 people in Kedzie Hall 106.

The forum, "Censorship, Propaganda and Live TV: The Press, the Military and the War in the Gulf," also included videotapes prepared by David MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, that showed the media's coverage of the war and televised discussions about that reporting.

MacFarland said the Cable News Network's reporting of the war had turned it into an electronic wire service reporting directly into the homes purchasing it.

"People who had CNN, when they heard that war had broken out, turned on CNN, and for some it's been on ever since," MacFarland said.

He also said some local affiliates of ABC, NBC and CBS have stopped using their network news services and begun providing viewers with CNN's reports.

"CNN has succeeded, in the words of its own advertising, in becoming the eyes and ears of the world, because it has more reporters in more places," he said.

T. Alden Williams, professor of political science, said the current conflict between the media and the military is an outgrowth of the tension between the openness required for democracy and the secrecy needed to conduct foreign relations.

There have been two sets of rules for political debate in the United States to balance this tension, Williams said. In domestic matters, debate was partisan and uninhibited. But when it came to foreign affairs, debate was limited and bipartisanship agreement was more important.

Robert Daly, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said there have been varying standards of censorship applied to the press during America's wars.

In the gulf war, because of the military's system of pooling a limited number of reporters to cover the conflict, readers and viewers are denied the observations of the media, Daly said.

Multicultural Student Council to meet, discuss national conference

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

There are many organizations on the K-State campus that are either totally unrepresented or have very little representation in the Multicultural Student Council.

Diana Caldwell, coordinator of the council, said the Multicultural Student Council attempts to draw these groups together and show them they can make a difference on campus.

The first issue that will be addressed at the meeting is the national multicultural conference to be held April 13.

The group will be sponsoring the KSU Talent Showcase. Participants need to be selected, and the time and date of the talent show will be announced at the meeting.

Also, the group will be discussing the Hispanics of Today conference to be held Feb. 23 and 24.

"We want at least two representatives from each of the 11 campus organizations," said Elva Mendez, junior in marketing and a member of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization.

K-Stater feels war's heat grow in Germany

John Mussman is currently a K-State senior in pre-veterinary medicine. He is in Giessen, Germany on the exchange program offered through K-State's Modern Language Department.

Well it's happened. War in the gulf. And as far as many Germans are concerned, war in the gulf means it's time to hate the Americans.

I'm sitting here in my dorm room at Justus-Liebig University in Giessen, Germany, listening to American Forces Network (AFN) radio. Just like I've been doing off and on — mostly on — since this whole thing broke loose at 12:44 a.m. central European time Jan. 17.

During the build-up to war since last August, and even more since the first allied attack, we K-State students in Giessen have been doing a lot of thinking, talking and worrying. We are sort of worried about the possibility of a draft. We've discussed the effect of burning oil fields on the environment. We've worried about the loss of life in the gulf and feared for the allied prisoners of war in Iraq. I personally wonder how a friend of mine down there is doing; she is an Israeli soldier.

We have gone over what we will do if we win — how long we will occupy Kuwait — and what will happen if we lose. Of course, then we have to wonder if this isn't really a Vietnam II, and from there whether the war will help or hurt the U.S. economy.

An off-shoot of this particular war is terrorism geared at Americans, though that's not to say that anyone is actually safe from it. Frankfurt's main airport has stepped up its security to the point where the place resembles a scene from George Orwell's "1984." AFN is warning listeners to stay away from places where Americans are known to congregate. It is advising us to be on the lookout for the strange package in the mail from an unknown address and for the surprise visit from the "furnace repairman" who was called.

Americans should, says the radio, maintain a low profile when in town and refrain from speaking in English too loud. The broadcasts advise Americans to attempt to blend in with the environment by not wearing the stereotypical white sneakers and T-shirts, but rather dark leather shoes and sweaters.

AFN provides this information for the benefit of American soldiers and their families still in Germany. But then, no terrorists will be able to tell, or care, that we are students and not from military families. Being American is good enough.

All in all, though, the threat of terrorism here — while still very real — can be reduced by safe living practices. We can do without the Big Mac at MacDonald's, and we can avoid the bars, discos and theaters where soldiers go. Dress habits can be changed, and we K-Staters can avoid the English question entirely by simply speaking German.

John Mussman
Senior/Pre-Vet
Guest Columnist

As for the war, Germany is not exactly in the line of fire, and at least right now there is no draft. Furthermore, no amount of tossing around in bed and losing sleep at night will change the course of events down in Iraq.

What cannot be avoided is the German citizen. More specifically, the radical German citizen. There are quite a few of them, too many in fact. And what's worse, they know you aren't German. They know from your shoes, your clothes, your manners and even your hairstyle that you are an "Auslander" — a foreigner. Open your mouth once, even in German, and it is immediately apparent that you are an "Ami" — a not so affectionate term for citizens from the United States.

The American accent on German is just as obvious to a German as the Oriental accent on English is to an American. And the Germans don't like it. You see it in their eyes. They stare at you as if you were a stinky old bum who just wandered in and relieved himself on their wedding cake. You stand in a crowded bar, and someone crashes into you, splashing beer on your jacket. You don't get an apology. Instead you hear, "Damned Ami! Always in the way."

I wrote a column once for the Collegian which attempted to address the issue of racism at K-State. One of the letters I received said, among other things, "You can never know what it is like to be a maltreated minority." At first, I kind of bought that view. "Yeah, okay," I said. "I'll never be black, I'll never be a woman and while I could convert to Judaism, it wouldn't be the same. I can understand how it is, but I'll never know."

But after half a year in the wonderful, beer-drinking, fun-loving country of Germany, I have found that a white, Christian male can indeed be a maltreated minority. That "you-have-no-right-to-talk" argument is the biggest crock of bull I have heard. Everyone can be maltreated and suffer from prejudice. It simply depends on the situation and the location.

Some of the incidents here are indeed different than the ones that have occurred at K-State. There are no signs hung in bars and no gang fights with racial overtones. On the other hand, there are anti-American flyers handed out on the street, banners on buildings and cutting remarks flipped your way as you pass by. The most obvious prejudice is evidenced by the anti-American graffiti that adorns buildings, bridges and sidewalks. And we can't leave out the demonstrations.

The night after the first attack on Iraq, a "demo" was held to protest the war. We went to observe the demonstration, because after all, it is part of the German culture. The thing turned out to be less anti-war and more like a Ku Klux Klan rally with Americans as the focus of their fun.

Some people carried torches, and others held signs which said such things as, "Ami imperialism! No thanks," and "Beam them up Scottie, there's no intelligent life in the U.S.," and just plain, "Amis get out!" We left when a guy rode through the crowd with a burning American flag strapped to his bike rack. There was little, if any, mention of Iraq during the demonstration.

Actually, most Germans are smart enough to realize that people should be judged on their individual qualities and not prejudged on stereotypes. But just as the vocal radicals worry the minorities at K-State, it is the vocal radicals in Germany at the moment that worry us Americans. "Hear the dog bark ... Does he bite?"

But I'm white, I'm male and I'm Christian. I can bloody well get out of the kitchen if I can't stand the heat (i.e. come home), right? Wrong.

If I get on a plane, I run the very real risk of getting blown out of the sky at 30,000 feet ... because I'm American.

War by any other name, still war

America: Home of the free and the brave ... and the euphemism.

Since childhood we have been forced to decipher the terminologies and cryptic phrases we are bombarded with daily to get down to the real meaning of what we see, hear and do.

These euphemisms were created, with the best of intentions, to protect people from hearing the harsh realities of life.

Like, for instance, most people seem more comfortable referring to loved ones as deceased, rather than dead.

Gov. Joan Finney feels more comfortable referring to a tax increase as a tax shift.

And President Bush seems more comfortable referring to the United States killing its own servicemen or women as death by friendly fire.

Operation Desert Storm, on the surface, seems like another example of a euphemism. Why doesn't President Bush call it a war? The press does.

Well, as it turns out, in this particular case Bush is the one being accurate. No euphemism there.

The United States has over 450,000 troops in Saudi Arabia, 12 soldiers killed in action, 24 soldiers missing, 8 prisoners of war and 14 aircraft lost, not to mention numerous allied soldiers killed, missing or being held prisoner. But we're not at war.

All Bush had to do to get Operation Desert Storm rolling was to go to Congress and ask for a resolution to "use force in the Persian Gulf." He didn't have to get permission to declare war, because after all, we're really not at war at all, right?

Wrong.

Having more than 450,000 Americans in the Persian Gulf "using force" against the Iraqis; bombing Iraqi cities; killing Iraqi military and citizens and losing American lives in the process is war.

Let's call a spade a spade. If we're going to fight a war, let's call it a war.

Let's demand that President Bush take the action required under the Constitution. He should have to appeal to Congress to declare war. Because, after all, war is war.

Hard hats necessary in falling world

"Should the whole frame of nature round him break,
In ruin and confusion hurled,
He, unconcerned, would hear the mighty crack,
And stand secure amidst a falling world."
Joseph Addison (1672-1719), British essayist, poet and statesman.

While waiting in line for service at a local hardware store, I overheard the following conversation between a salesman and the gentleman in front of me:

"May I help you, sir?"
"Yes, I would like to buy a hard hat. What do you have in stock?"

"That depends on the intended use of the hat and the size you require."

"I wear a size eight, and I would rather not state the purpose for which it is to be used."

The salesman looked at the customer as though he wanted to say to someone with a hat size that large, "You don't need a hat, you need a bucket."

The fellow's head was not unusually large in relation to his body, but I must admit that, due to a rather extensive lack of cranial foliage, I did notice a small protuberance in the occipital region of the cranium (quite possibly a family trait, or, as my fan mail sometimes suggests, an injury incurred as a direct result from being dropped on the head as an infant) which extended out from his head to such a degree as to add as much as half an inch to his hat size.

"I think we have your size in a number of styles, but I must insist that you tell me for what purpose you intend to use head protection. It is quite critical to the selection of safe head gear."

"Falling debris from outer space."

This time "Kojak" got the "you don't need a bucket, you need a straightjacket" look. "I am afraid I misunderstood you. You say you need a hard hat to protect your head from debris ... from space?"

"Exactly. I need something fairly strong and reliable, and I need it now. There is a big piece of space junk about to fall from space sometime this week."

I am afraid at this point I had to intercede on behalf of the customer and confirm his fear.

"He is quite right, you know. Pieces of the Soviet Union's 40-ton Salyut-7 space station and an attached Cosmos-1686 cargo ferry are expected to plunge to Earth Wednesday or Thursday of this week."

In response to my newsy quip the salesman asked, "Who are you, Carl Sagan?"

"Well, no. But it just so happens I write a column for an excellent local newspaper, and I recently did a small amount of research for my column this week on our 'orbital junkyard.'"

Not allowing the salesman a moment's pause to interrupt, and with Kojak grinning from ear to ear, I continued.

"This is not the first time we have had to dodge falling debris from space. In January, 1978, the nuclear-powered, Soviet Cosmos 954 fell to Earth, contaminating the atmosphere and parts of Canada with radioactive materials. In July, 1979, Skylab broke into the earth's atmosphere with numerous pieces striking the Indian Ocean and southwestern Australia. And it is projected that a 3-ton piece of the Salyut-7 spacecraft will survive re-entry to strike Earth at some, as yet, unknown location."

"It could land on your home," I said, pointing to the salesman. "Or, as the customer fears, on his home," I said, as I pointed to a shaking Kojak.

I could see I had them both on the run, and was even beginning to draw a small crowd, so I continued.

"Since 1957, more than 3,600 satellites have been put into earth orbit by the United States and other countries in possession of such technology. Of the 7,150 manmade objects in orbit that are currently tracked by the military, only 5 percent are active satellites. The rest are 'space junk.'"

"There are hundreds of pieces the size of an average house. There are 30,000-70,000 fragments ranging in size from one to 10 centimeters. There are several million smaller than a millimeter, and billions of still smaller items, including paint chips from satellites and the fragments of satellites that have exploded.

"One problem with all this space debris is the Russian 'space junk' roulette we are about to play this week. The very large pieces remain intact after burning during re-entry into the atmosphere, and survive with sufficient size to pose a very real and unpredictable threat if they should strike land."

"The other problem is the threat to the near-space environment. The debris is increasing at an alarming rate as some of the larger pieces break up into smaller pieces. As a measure of the damage small orbiting debris can inflict, a 0.5 millimeter metal chip, travelling at an average relative speed of 10 kilometers per second, would kill an astronaut working outside a spaceship. And a particle as small as 1-10 millimeters could damage or even destroy an orbiting satellite or spacecraft."

By this time there were 20 to 30 people listening to my extemporaneous diatribe.

"So, how do we protect ourselves from all that falling space garbage?" asked one nervous woman.

"I am going to wear a hard hat all this week, and pray," said Kojak, as he slammed a steel hat on his head.

"I really don't think you need to go to such extremes," I said. "The odds of actually being struck by a single piece of debris entering Earth's atmosphere must be astronomical."

"As for praying," I said, "I personally don't believe such foolishness."

"Here. You are going to need this," said Kojak, as he handed me his steel hat.

"Why?" I asked. "Forget about falling space debris. Anyone who doesn't believe in prayer and lives in a nation with 'In God We Trust' as its motto, stands an excellent chance of being stoned to death."

"Good point. I'll take one."

Another perspective

There's still hope for the future.

According to a survey of college freshman, students are becoming less interested in making money and are becoming more interested in social issues.

Conducted by the University of California at Los Angeles and the American Council on Education, the study found that students are becoming more involved in campus activism and are subsequently choosing to turn their collective backs on business careers.

It finally looks like the pendulum is swinging back from the dark, money-grabbing, me-first attitudes of the Ronald Reagan years. The 1980s seemed to sound the death knell for activism and dissent, and for individualism.

Now, inexplicably, consciousness seems to have been raised.

Perhaps the Persian Gulf War could turn out to be a good thing. Perhaps the war can help college-age people take possession of their rights and speak out against poor government policies and pursuits.

Despite its desperately flawed beginnings, perhaps there is still hope for the future.

Lady Sooners rout baffled Lady Cats

ERIC BROWN
Sports Reporter

The Lady Cats had visions of a Big Eight title and a possible NCAA Tournament bid dancing in their heads as they strutted into Lloyd Noble Center in Norman, Okla., on Wednesday. The Lady Sooners replaced those visions with doubts.

Oklahoma dealt K-State a blow that sent the team reeling out of the top spot in the conference and back into second place, largely due to hot shooting from Oklahoma and icy cold percentages from the Lady Cats.

The Sooners, 3-6 in the Big Eight and 9-14 overall, scored 53 second-half points to run away from the Lady Cats and post an 88-56 victory.

K-State, 6-3 in the Big Eight and 13-7 overall, played poorly from the start, trailing 11-2 early. Things didn't get any brighter as the Lady Cats shot a meager 32 percent for the game.

The Lady Cats slowly crawled back at the Sooners through the first half, but a late rally by Oklahoma moved the margin out to eight at the half, 35-27.

It was all OU from that point on, however, as the Sooners shot a red-hot 68 percent in the second half and made it appear much more difficult for K-State at the other end.

"I don't have any answers as to why we had such a poor showing," Lady Cat coach Susan Yow said. "We just didn't show up to play."

One bright spot for the Lady Cats was the play of starter Kristina Bahner and reserve Leah Honeycutt, who combined for 19 points and 15 rebounds.

The Lady Cats mustered one last rally behind a seven-point spurt of Diana Miller to open the second half, but the well ran dry and a Lady Cat power outage quickly ballooned the margin back to 15. K-State would never threaten again.

"We did not play well in the second half, and that really hurt us," Yow said. "We had a lot of missed opportunities, and when you miss that many, you are going to lose."

And lose the Lady Cats did. The 32-point margin represented their largest defeat of the season.

Wildcats land 22 football recruits

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

A recruiting effort geared toward higher caliber athletes left K-State football coach Bill Snyder with mixed feelings Wednesday, the first day for prospects to sign national letters of intent.

"We are delighted with the quality of the young men who have signed with Kansas State," Snyder said. "But we finished second far too many times."

The Wildcats inked 22 players, including 19 high school seniors and three community-college transfers. K-State's accomplishments were highlighted in Florida, where Snyder landed six players from the Sunshine State's rich pool of football talent.

The biggest disappointment may have been in-state recruiting. In-state rival Kansas signed 10 players on opening day to K-State's five.

"I had a little concern about our recruiting in the state of Kansas," Snyder said. "We made an extremely strong effort as we always have and always will. KU did a nice job and certainly had more success in the state than we did."

"There were another four players that we very actively recruited, and just didn't get into our program."

K-State, as expected, claimed two players from its own territory in Manhattan High's Brian Lojka and Steve Hanks. Lojka, a 6-foot-6, 235-pound tight end, was one of four newcomers 6-6 or taller.

The average size of the 'Cats' eight incoming linemen is 6-4, 248 pounds.

"We were able to get the kind of size that we wanted," Snyder said. "All of them are youngsters who will handle additional weight quite well, also."

K-State's other in-state signees included Jeff Smith, 6-1, 255, from Arkansas City and Brent Venables, 6-1, 230, from Salina. Smith was a member of the Topeka Capital-Journal's all-state top 11 team as a senior. Venables earned second team all-Jayhawk Conference honors as linebacker last season for Garden City Community College.

A pair of Florida standouts topped the 'Cats' out-of-state haul. Bryant Brooks, 6-2, 215, from Crystal River, Fla., rushed for 3,000 yards during his prep career. Gerald Benton, 5-8, 155, from Bradenton, Fla., caught 88 passes during his career as Venables' teammate at GCCC.

"Bryant Brooks give us a dimension at running back that we may not have had before," Snyder said. "And Benton, because of quickness, speed and overall athletic ability gives us the same thing at that position."

K-State stockpiled its skill positions with three running backs, three wide receivers and two quarterbacks. An area that Snyder said his staff will continue to recruit is defensive linemen. The 'Cats' signed only three.

K-State reportedly lost between eight and 10 recruiting battles in the past week that would have added to the quality of the incoming class.

Sports Briefly

'Hawks surge past 'Huskers

LAWRENCE — Richard Scott scored the first six points in a 14-4 second-half surge, vaulting No. 18 Kansas over a taller 15th-ranked Nebraska 85-77 Wednesday night in a battle of Big Eight leaders.

The victory gave Kansas, 11-0 at home this season, a 16-4 overall mark a Big Eight log of 5-2. Kansas and Nebraska (18-4, 4-3) had been tied for the Big Eight lead with Oklahoma State, which beat Iowa State Wednesday night to keep pace with the Jayhawks.

Kansas, averaging 6-foot-4 to Nebraska's 6-8 up and down the starting lineup, carved out a 45-39 halftime lead despite Rich King, Nebraska's 7-2 senior center who had 19 points in the first half while working against Kansas' 6-9 Mark Randall. King finished with a season-high 25 points while Randall had 16.

Kansas led 56-55 early in the second half when Scott, who had 14 points, banked in a 10-footer to start the decisive run.

Snyder and Co. travel coast to coast

David Svoboda

Sports Editor

The recruiting business is a strange game.

Business? Game? What is recruiting, really?

It's a little bit of both. It's a business in that men are hired — and fired — based on their performance while doing it.

Recruit well, and you stay around. Don't, and it's time to hit the happy coaching highway.

K-State's Bill Snyder and his staff — headed by recruiting guru Tom Grogan — hit the highway and the airways hard this winter to bring the top talent to Manhattan.

And, like in any game, there were winners and losers. K-State appears to have lost in the state of Kansas, where the total number of Sunflower State products signed by the 'Cats was five, down from seven a year ago.

But the 'Cats may have won in Florida. The Sunshine State yielded six new purple prospects, compared with none just one recruiting season ago.

That's a win, to be sure. And to win, you've got to be willing to pay the piper.

K-State signed players from 10 different states in 1991, compared to nine in 1990.

The 10 states include the aforementioned Kansas and Florida, plus Louisiana, Missouri, Illinois, Oklahoma, Ohio, Texas, Iowa and that football hotbed of all football hotbeds, Hawaii.

Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, Texas and Iowa all produced 'Cats in 1990 as well. Fertile ground in 1990 that didn't prove so in 1991 was found in California, Pennsylvania and Utah.

It's a veritable geography lesson unfolding right before your eyes. Did the 'Cats win or lose, in the final analysis?

They won by: making strong inroads into Florida; going back to Louisiana — a place that a guy by the name of Michael Smith calls home; and by inking a player from Oklahoma. If the 'Cats sign a Nebraska high school standout next year and one from Colorado the next, wow, they'll have hit the big time.

The 'Cats lost by: seeing the combined Kansas/Missouri number drop from 11 to 7; seeing the California pipeline dry up; realizing Pennsylvania and Utah were a bust after producing quality players in Andre Coleman and Kitt Rawlings last winter.

Only time will tell, however, whether all of this travel — all these business flights — will pay off on the field.

It's there the wins and losses that count will be measured.

Reports positive on Gubicza

Royals' pitcher pain-free following 60-pitch workout

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The new pitching coach of the Kansas City Royals is encouraged by what he sees of Mark Gubicza and figures he could be back in action sooner than expected.

But Pat Dobson, after watching the right-hander go through a 60-pitch workout Tuesday at Royals Stadium, also says he wants to make some major changes in the pitching mechanics of the Royals' star who won 35 games over the 1988 and 1989 seasons.

"He was always a blowout waiting to happen," Dobson said. "I could tell that from watching him a couple years ago."

Gubicza is working his way back into pitching form after arthroscopic surgery on the rotator cuff area of his shoulder. But the problem Dobson is concerned about has more to do with Gubicza's legs than anything else.

Gubicza said his tendency was to start his pitching motion by stepping way back and off to the side. Dobson wants a shorter first step that's straight back so he's better balanced.

"My arm comes through naturally that way," Gubicza said. "Throwing the ball today felt simple. No strain. I liked it."

Gubicza said he's been throwing at about 50 or 60 percent his normal velocity. But he said he popped a few balls in there during Tuesday's workout.

"I thought I'd have some fatigue at the end, but the last 10 pitches felt good," he said. "I could have kept going."

Dobson said Gubicza could be ready by the time the season opens.

"He looks good," Dobson said.

White still looking for work

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Veteran second baseman Frank White wasn't offered a contract with the Kansas City Royals for the upcoming season, and he blames the Royals for a lack of interest from other clubs.

White, 39, said he'd love to keep playing baseball.

"But I just don't see that happening at this late of a date," he said. "The Royals did a good job of convincing people that I couldn't play. They did a good job of convincing people that I had retired."

But Herk Robinson, the Royals general manager, said he had personally recommended White to a couple of clubs that asked about him.

"We certainly didn't announce his retirement," he said.

"I've talked to a lot of teams, but it's been difficult explaining why I think I can still play," said White, who spent his entire 18-year big league career with Kansas City.

"They're basically going to look at a .216 batting average. They're going to look at the fact that Bill Pecota played a lot of second base. They're going to look at the fact that even Kevin Seitzer was thought to be a better second baseman at the end of the year."

"Which I know is not true, but this is the picture that was painted. And it's a hard picture to wipe off."

White was a part-time player last year, playing in just 82 games. He started out with a home run against Baltimore on opening day and drove in seven runs in his first 11 games. But he went on the disabled list in late April. He finished with 21 RBI, two homers and one stolen base to go with the .216 average.

For now, White is setting his sights on other possibilities, saying he has been approached about franchises from car dealerships to fast-food. He said the dealership possibilities were interested only in his name.

"I don't like that because I don't like (just) having my name on something," he said. "If you can't explain to these people what you're doing, well, then you look like an idiot."

White said he has been approached about joining a group that would try to buy the Kansas City area Double Eagle distributorship for Anheuser-Busch beer. He said he is interested, but on his terms.

"The day is gone where black people can be used as front people anymore," he said. "We're at a point now where we want to get in and learn the business. We don't want to be at functions and people ask us about the business and your answer is you don't know."

"You don't want to be in a situation where you're just there to sign autographs and kiss babies and things like that."

Kiam errs again

By the Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — New England Patriots owner Victor Kiam apologized Wednesday for a joke he told at a banquet about Lisa Olson and the Persian Gulf War.

At the awards banquet of the Stamford (Conn.) Old-Timers Athletic Association, Kiam, one of 15 honorees, asked what the Iraqis "have in common with Lisa Olson? They've both seen Patriot missiles up close," USA Today reported Wednesday.

Olson was the sports writer who was sexually harassed in the locker room last season by several Patriots' players.

Professor emphasizes communication

Fedder said he reads the logs at the end of the course and uses the student feedback to improve his teaching.

The class is recommended for students of junior status.

Johnny Gaffney, senior in pre-law, proposes to Colleen Dalton, senior in speech pathology, during a parodical skit, "Romeo and Juliet," in a creative dramatics class offered in the theater department. Meeting twice a week, students perform and direct fairy tales.

Stanley Crowder, a candidate in the last two city commission elections, was to be included in this article but could not be reached before press deadlines.

System to differ if bill passes

CHRISTINE SPLICAL
Collegian Reporter

Kansas Legislators are attempting to write a bill to impose more fair and uniform sentencing for criminal offenses.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said the Legislature is currently hearing testimony on a proposed bill to impose a state-wide sentencing system for criminals. This bill will not be officially drafted until next week.

"Sentences often vary for the same crime and that kind of discretion is unfair," she said. "Time and time again sentencing discriminates against minorities, which brings up racial issues.

"If a person commits a crime in Dodge City, and someone commits the same crime somewhere else in Kansas, they will receive the same treatment and sentence," Oleen said.

Oleen said she was still undecided about the bill.

"I'm still doing my job and listening to the pros and the cons."

Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said if the bill passes, only two things would be considered during sentencing — the crime and the person's past criminal history. This system would set up a grid, if the person had a criminal history they would be higher up in the grid and thus, receive a stiffer sentence.

The Kansas Sentencing Commission, set up by the 1989 legislature, is proposing this bill after examining two points. Hochhauser said the Department of Corrections in Kansas had no way to predict the number of prisoners coming into the system each year. The second point is the disparity of sentencing a defendant receives across the state.

This disparity can be because of the geographic region, the defendant's race and the case load of the region, she said.

Bush to compensate veterans of Vietnam

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed legislation Wednesday to compensate Vietnam War veterans exposed to the herbicide Agent Orange.

The measure permanently extends disability benefits to Vietnam veterans suffering from two types of cancer presumed to be caused by the herbicide: non-Hodgkins' lymphoma and soft-tissue sarcoma.

"A grateful nation salutes our veterans," Bush said. "From Midway to Normandy, from Inchon to Khe Sanh, to last week's battle at Khafji, American Marines, soldiers, airmen, sailors, Coast Guardsmen have given their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor to keep freedom safe."

Bush used the signing ceremony to praise U.S. forces in the Persian Gulf.

"Our allied forces are sacrificing much today in the pursuit of peace for tomorrow. And the American people, I believe, are behind them foursquare."

KSU Alumni Association tops conference schools

SEAN MORAN
Collegian Reporter

The donation process is only one of several duties performed by the KSU Alumni Association.

The alumni association, through its records department, keeps the updated addresses of more than 114,000 alumni and groups associated with the University. This list is used by the KSU Foundation as a mailing list for potential donors.

This is a big reason why the alumni association, with more than 31,000 members, ranks first in the Big Eight in membership percentage.

"We're a communication link between the alumni and the University," Amy Renz, assistant director of the KSU Alumni Association, said. "Our purpose is to provide alumni the opportunity to interact with their alma mater and promote what's happening on campus."

One way this is done is through the K-Stater magazine and the K-State Connection newsletter. The K-Stater is published five times a year for members of the alumni association only. The K-State Connection is a newsletter published three times a year for alumni members in the Kansas City area.

The alumni association helps pay for the cost of those publications with another of its membership benefits, the Wildcat credit card.

Members of the association have the opportunity to purchase a purple Mastercard or Visa and the alumni association receives a percentage on the charges made. More than 11,500 alumni currently have the credit card.

One doesn't have to graduate from K-State to become a member of the alumni association. If a student attends K-State for a semester, they are eligible to become a member.

Friends, parents and companies can also belong to the KSU Alumni Association. Membership fees are $20 for a single year and $55 for a three-year membership. Joint memberships and eight-year memberships are also available.

Alumni Association income sources

The Alumni Association receives income from several different sources, including proceeds off a credit card it sponsors. Last year the association received $1.15 million.

Source: K-State Alumni Association

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Renz said about 80 to 90 percent of the association's members are graduates of K-State while the rest of the members are considered sidewalk alumni.

"Loyalty is very strong," Renz said. "They are concerned about their alma mater, not only financially but also through participation."

Participation is achieved in several ways. The alumni association holds College Night, where prospective students get the chance to meet alumni from particular professions. Eleven such nights were held last year, and 255 prospective students were able to find out more about K-State.

Alumni also participate through reunions. The alumni association holds an annual reunion for alumni of 40, 45 and 50 years. All members who have graduated more than 50 years ago, called the Circle K Club, are eligible to return for the reunion every year.

About 6,700 invitations are sent out to alumni who fall in this category every year. The reunions usually have between 350 and 500 guests.

The reunion lasts two days and allows the alumni the chance to tour the campus and Manhattan to see changes and improvements made over the years. They also have the opportunity to visit with current students.

"We have many people who return," said Grace Prusik, alumni program coordinator. "They enjoy meeting their classmates and coming back when students are on campus because they do visit with the students."

The reunions also have class dinners, where those attending are split up into their respective colleges to

Senate looks at smoking

Resolution to provide cleaner environment for students

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

In recent years, the controversy of smoking rights in public places has grown, and it is currently hitting home at the K-State Union.

In tonight's meeting of Student Senate, a resolution asking the Union Governing Board to ban smoking from all areas of the Union will be debated.

If Senate passes the resolution, it will go to the UGB for a final decision. Student Senator Derek Nelson, sophomore in business and sponsor of the resolution, said the UGB had previously tabled the issue until the Student Senate made a decision on the issue. UGB has said in the past that the Student Senate is the best representation of the student body.

Nelson said the purpose for the resolution is to provide a cleaner environment for all students.

"The problem is that second-hand smoke causes enormous health problems - not only to those who smoke it, but to every student walking through the Union," Nelson said.

The idea of smoke-free public facilities is not new to K-State, or other campuses. Nelson said the state of Kansas has a non-smoking ban in all public buildings except in designated areas determined by building directors. Nelson said two universities, Penn State and Temple College, are entirely smoke-free throughout the campus.

Nelson said he knows many smokers feel their right to smoke in public is threatened, but he said he questions that right.

"I'm sure they feel their rights are being taken away. I disagree. I don't think people have the right to smoke, I think they have the privilege - those are two completely different things," he said.

Senator Laura Vetter, sophomore in philosophy, said she agrees smoking is harmful, but she doesn't agree an individual's right to smoke in a public place should be dictated by Senate policy.

"I would like to see the Union go through a more positive aspect and give them (smokers) a room," Vetter said. "That's all they want. There's enough smokers on this campus to justify it."

Vetter said she thinks students should have a say in whether or not to ban smoking from the Union, since it is their building. Polling the students or possibly sending the issue up for referendum are just a few ways to accomplish this, she said. Vetter said non-traditional students and minorities should be talked to in order to reflect the entire campus, not just the segment of 18 to 22-year-olds who are mostly widely represented in senate.

"The mentality on this campus is that it's just a small minority. I think they will be surprised," she said.

Vetter is urging everyone who opposes this resolution to attend tonight's Senate meeting at and voice their concern. It will be at 7 in the Union's Big Eight Room.

U.S. shoots down 2 more Iraqi jets

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — In another day of nonstop aerial ballistics, the United States shot down at least two fleeing Iraqi jets Wednesday, and Iraq blasted the sky with intense anti-aircraft fire, allied military officials said.

Iraq claimed that 150 civilians had been killed in a single air raid, including 35 children. Baghdad radio complained that the United States and its allies were bombing hospitals, mosques and houses.

"They want to expel Iraq from the 20th century," the radio said.

Iraq announced that it was severing diplomatic ties with the United States, Britain, France, Italy, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

Jordan's King Hussein appealed for a cease-fire in the Persian Gulf War, which he said was destroying Iraq. But in Washington, Secretary of State James Baker tried to steel Congress for a long and bloody fight.

"The military actions now under way necessarily involve many casualties, great hardships and growing fears for the future," Baker said in testimony to the House Foreign Affairs Committee. "Tough times lie ahead."

Allied bombers continued to unload tons of explosives on Iraq's Republican Guards' highly fortified positions.

"He gets little sleep both day and night," Marine Brig. Gen. Richard Neal said of the Iraqi soldiers.

"We're dropping a lot of ordnance on the Republican Guard, not just to lower their morale, but also to destroy their tanks, their artillery, their logistical sustainment capability and their built-up areas," Neal said. "We're out there to destroy the Republican Guard."

Ten more Iraqi planes flew to Iran, bringing the total there to about 120. But for the first time, the allies reported shooting down some of the fleeing planes, Neal said.

A Saudi Arabian military spokesman said American F-15s shot down four of seven Iraqi jets as they tried to make the dash across the border. Neal said only two planes were confirmed kills, while two MiG-21s were listed as possibly shot down.

K-State Union Host to the Campus

Kansas Gov. Joan Finney speaks to Barbara Stowe, dean of human ecology, Al Lane, 25th district representative, and other members of the College of Human Ecology during a dinner in the K-State Union Wednesday. The dinner, sponsored by human ecology, gave the governor a chance to learn about the programs in the college.

Finney meets with Stowe, students to discuss issues

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

Gov. Joan Finney was invited to dine with the dean of the College of Human Ecology, department heads, faculty and students in the Sunflower Room at the K-State Union Wednesday night.

During the meal, Finney and the guests talked about the College of Human Ecology, state and national issues, issues pertinent to higher education and about family members and friends.

Finney said Kansas is in a nationwide recessionary period, and it is affecting the state. Currently, Kansas is $30 million below projected revenue this fiscal year.

Finney said she particularly was concerned about three sectors of the state economy — agriculture, oil production and small businesses.

Finney said the federal subsidies for agriculture, in the next fiscal year, are going to be cut to $13.6 billion. At a reduction of $12.4 billion, it will have a detrimental effect on the Kansas economy and the farmer, she said.

Finney said over 90 Kansas counties produce oil. It is the ninth-largest oil producing state in the nation. She is concerned about the prices oil producers get for their product and the revenues generated by the production of oil.

Finney said small businesses were affected by the property tax reappraisal. This has forced many small businesses out of business in Kansas.

"I see the vacant buildings affected by the demise of agriculture and the oil industry," Finney said.

Finney said she has three solutions to solve the economic problems of Kansas.

First, the property taxes must be rolled back by 30 percent on each piece of property. Next, the loopholes in the state sales tax must be closed to create additional revenue to fund state programs.

"We must have property tax relief to stop the foreclosure of homes and businesses," Finney said. "I will be the bad guy. I will take the blame. I will take it to the people who have the special tax dispensations. If they don't want to do it my way, then they can put something else on the table. We must have property tax relief."

Finney said she was willing to look at other funding proposals during the legislative session. State legislators could submit alternative plans besides closing loopholes in the state

Gorbachev vows to hold 15 republics together

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Mikhail Gorbachev made a surprise television appearance Wednesday night to express his determination to hold the country together and urge full participation in the Kremlin's referendum on the union.

"All my convictions are based on preservation of the union," the Soviet president said.

"The Soviet Union is a superpower," he said. "Huge efforts were made to make it so powerful, and we could lose it very quickly."

It was Gorbachev's clearest declaration to date that he will not let any of the 15 republics secede. While acknowledging that areas were brought into the union by force, he said the fate of all now depends on remaining in a common economic system.

"Everybody should understand that we are deciding the destiny of our state," he said. "The U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet (legislature) should make sure every citizen expresses his opinion."

At least five republics — Lithuania, Estonia, Latvia, Georgia and Armenia — have scoffed at the referendum and reject Soviet law in their territory.

All 15 Soviet republics have proclaimed greater control of their own affairs, and many have demanded recognition by the Kremlin before they sign Gorbachev's proposed Union Treaty.

Institute brings faculty together

Students develop plans for state soil information system

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

In the summer of 1990 the Kansas Board of Regents approved a proposal for the development of the Institute of Social and Behavioral Research at K-State.

With the input of faculty and the dean's staff, a steering committee was formed two years ago to come up with a plan that would bring the faculty together under common interests.

The institute creates an interdisciplinary between the faculty in the social science, behavioral science, geography and the history departments.

This program has been successful at many other larger universities, said Jack Holl, associate dean for arts and sciences. He said the goal for the institute is to compete for funded grants in social and behavioral sciences by using interdisciplinary mechanisms.

"I was named the director of ISBR Aug. 1, 1990," said Duane Nellis, professor in geography. "We've set up five focal points or programs since then."

The Geographic Information Systems/Spatial Analysis works in contract with the department of agronomy and the department of geography. Nellis said they've already begun their project for the development of a computer-based soil information system for Kansas. The project supports four graduate assistants and about 10 undergraduates.

The Labor Studies Program builds relationships with the Kansas labor and the business community, said Nellis. One of the goals for this program is to create a stronger relationship between work and society.

The Statistical Design and Analysis Unit and the Survey Research Unit has recently completed the 1990 Kansas Rural Issues Poll.

The poll was sponsored by KSU Institute for Social and Behavioral Research, KSU Agricultural Experiment Station, Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, Huck Boyd Foundation, Huck Boyd National Institute for Rural Development, Kansas Department of Commerce and KSU Department of Human Development and Family Studies.

The survey was taken of residents in the 79 counties across Kansas that have a population of less than 20,000.

The goal of the survey was to find out some background information of rural Kansas because it doesn't exist, said James Franke, associate professor in political science. He said the survey was successful with a high response rate.

The Advanced Research Development Program has eight research associates who will receive summer money for the development of research proposals. This is for new K-State faculty members in the social science department.

"This particular program will also provide about $5,000 in scholarships to the upperclass undergraduates," Nellis said. "These students will work with the faculty in the social science department. It will be like a competition where the students present their research work and the faculty will decide who wins. It's similar to an honor thesis."

Performer to act out stories

ALISA DIETZ
Collegian Reporter

A professional storyteller will present "Worldwide Folktales of Wishes and Wisdom," a program including stories from Ethiopia, Yemen, Afghanistan, Europe and Russia. Cherie Karo Schwartz will act out the stories at 8 p.m. today in Nichols 007. Admission is free to the public.

Norman Fedder, head of the drama department, said he is responsible for Schwartz coming to K-State. His association with Schwartz comes from mutual involvement in the Coalition for Advancement of Jewish Education, and she has acted in some of his plays.

"Storytelling is the oldest form of art, which has become very popular the last few years," Fedder said. "She is one of the best I've listened to; you can't help but listen."

Schwartz's vibrant personality is one of the qualities that makes her such an outstanding storyteller, Fedder said.

This is Schwartz's first time to K-State, and she is very anxious to visit the campus, Fedder said. She is giving two workshops to a storytelling class on Friday morning. The workshops will be a discussion demonstration in which she will give some tips on the process of telling stories.

Schwartz travels extensively throughout the country telling various stories for adult and family audiences, organizations and groups telling more than 200 stories she has collected throughout the years.

Schwartz works with children and adults in many different places including libraries, museums, classrooms and on stage.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Soldiers' children discuss concern for parents in gulf

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

War is an emotional time, but even more emotional for a child who doesn't understand why one or both parents have been deployed.

"The likelihood exists that you could be without both parents instantly," Doyle Barnes, principal at Ogden Elementary School, said.

The Ogden Elementary School has 231 students. Out of that total 138 students have a parent deployed to Saudi Arabia, Barnes said.

A month before deployment began, the Manhattan/Ogden school district began plans to form open discussion groups for children of deployed parents, he said. Fort Scott and Fort Riley have also implemented similar programs.

Meeting with other children in the same situation helps them understand they're not in it alone, Barnes said.

"It gives kids an opportunity to talk about their feelings," said Ellie Zoerink, school social worker.

Zoerink gives in-class presentations to teach children about Iraq's culture, what a desert is and where Saudi Arabia is located.

Zoerink also speaks to students having more trouble than others dealing with feelings.

Irmie Fallon, kindergarten teacher at the elementary school, said the children are able to locate Saudi Arabia on a map or globe.

"We try to keep things as normal as possible," said Zoerink.

School is the one place that remains stable during such a disturbing time in their lives, she said.

Groups meet every Tuesday and Thursday during and after school. Discussions are led by teachers and usually last about 45 minutes, Barnes

Veterans offer helping hand

American Legion members support families of soldiers

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

Veterans organizations provide a helping hand to family members of active troops in Operation Desert Storm.

The American Legion, an organization of war-time veterans, has a national family assistance program and is currently acting locally.

They are selling buttons to raise money for the program and are collecting magazines to be sent to troops in the Persian Gulf.

The Legion, though, has not been contacted much by families of troops, because most are taken care of by Fort Riley support groups and Project Manhattan Cares, said Carl Griffie, club manager.

Another service the Legion provides is selling flags at cost so people can fly them to show their support of the troops.

"The Legion is currently sold out of flags," said Griffie.

Veterans of Foreign Wars members are available to military families as an aid or a friend to help out by shoveling a walk talking with family members, Griffie said.

The VFWs, however, have not implemented other programs at this time.

"We are making plans for future programs that will be announced later," said Roy Currie, post commander.

"The support that is offered by the American Legion and other groups is enormously important to families," said Joyce Woodford, a counselor at the University Counseling Services.

She said it is important for the community to unite in support of

Now you can afford to dream in color.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

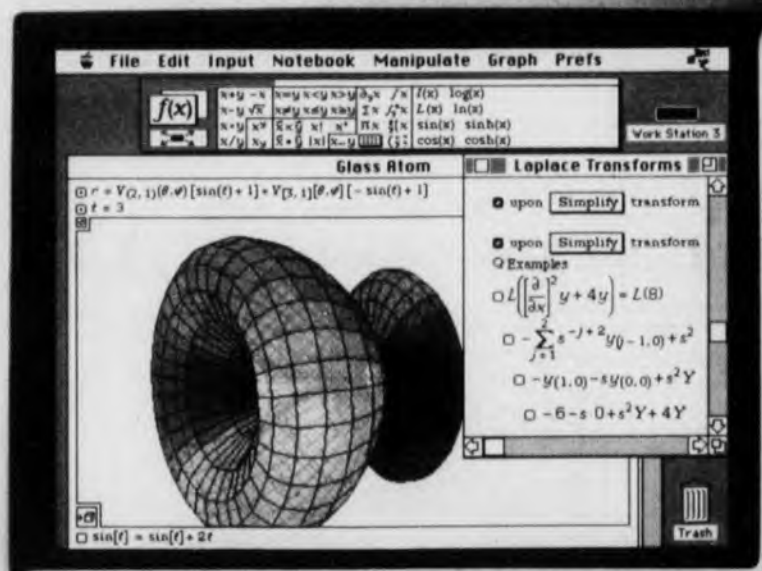

It's better than a dream—it's a Macintosh.

ROTC program not yet altered by war in gulf

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Members of the K-State ROTC programs will not have to serve in the Persian Gulf War unless they are already part of the Reserve or National Guard, said Douglas Booker, assistant professor of military science.

"There isn't any direct relationship with the war," he said, "we have a mission to train future officer leadership and that remains the same."

Booker said the war hasn't had any impact, as of yet, on the ROTC programs but, as in other courses, it is frequently discussed.

ROTC members could be sent to the gulf after graduation.

Students do not graduate from K-State with a degree in ROTC, rather they graduate with the degree of their choice. After completing the ROTC program and graduating with their chosen degree, the cadet officer is commissioned.

When commissioned, they are called to active duty as a second lieutenant, the lowest commissioned officer rank. Then they must take basic specialty training, which could take anywhere from four to 20 weeks, Booker said.

There isn't any direct relationship with the war. We have a mission to train future officer leadership and that remains the same.

—Douglas Booker assistant professor of military science

Only after the training could an officer, former ROTC member, be called to serve in a war such as the Persian Gulf War.

"The people sent to combat zones are fully prepared when they arrive," said John McTasney, professor of aerospace studies.

Four of the 98 members of Air Force ROTC, and five of the 125 members of Army ROTC, should be commissioned this June, McTasney and Booker said.

The only other way an ROTC member can be sent to the gulf is through a reinstatement of the draft, with the same odds as any other 18-year-old male.

"Stop Loss" is the President's authorization to keep active military on active status for the duration of a crisis.

Through "Stop Loss," the President has extended reserves for up to two years on active duty, has the authorization to call up 2 million reservists and extend people presently on active duty for the duration of the gulf crisis, according to recent news articles.

"The draft was discontinued after the Vietnam War, and since then the military has been on an all-volunteer basis," McTasney said.

"The ROTC program at K-State was mandatory for all healthy freshman and sophomore male students until 1964. Today, 100 percent of the members are involved by choice," McTasney said.

The summer of their sophomore year, Air Force ROTC members are selected to attend a four week camp.

After completion of the camp, the members are called cadet officers.

Cadet officers who wish to continue the ROTC program sign agreements, which specifies that after graduation they will serve the required number of years. The length depends on the branch. An Air Force pilot, for example, serves 10 years.

The junior and senior years of ROTC are spent learning international relations and acting as a commander in leadership labs for the freshman and sophomores. They are also paid $100 per month.

Education students to attend teaching, creativity sessions

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

More than 350 College of Education students will attend the Fourth Annual Education Symposium Feb. 8 in the K-State Union.

"Piecing It All Together" is the theme for the symposium, sponsored by the College of Education.

Seventeen different sessions will be offered during the day, and each participant can attend five of the sessions.

Student teaching, creativity, role-playing, environmental education, sexuality education and critical thinking are some of the session topics.

Ideas for the sessions are suggested by faculty members and students, said Kirk Schuler, senior in history and elementary education and a committee chairman.

Many of the sessions expound on ideas and suggestions that are covered briefly in education classes.

"Students are interested in timely topics," Schuler said. "We got some good suggestions from last year's symposium."

Speakers for the various sessions include professors in education, principals from area schools and teachers who are presently teaching. Some of the speakers are from Kansas City, Topeka and Wichita.

"Either we have heard them (the speakers) before, or we know them," said Cindy Doperalski, junior in elementary education and the presenters' committee chairwoman.

Two of the speakers are Jerry Dixon, principal of Junction City High School, and Dan Yunk, principal of Northview Elementary School, Manhattan.

They will present a session on interviewing, telling future teachers what they look for when hiring and tips for first-year teachers.

"Most people are worried about interviewing," Doperalski said. "So this is one of our most popular sessions."

The symposium is organized by education students. Four people serve as committee heads, and 18 others serve on the four committees. The committees have been organizing the event since last April.

"We try to get a good balance between sessions for elementary ed majors and secondary ed majors," Doperalski said. "Since the needs of the two are different."

Owner of apartment complex sued

By the Associated Press

LENEXA — The owners and managers of a Lenexa apartment complex where Richard Grissom Jr. was a painter have been sued by the family of a woman Grissom killed.

Harold Brown of Belton, the father of Theresa Brown, filed the lawsuit last week in Johnson County District Court seeking an unspecified amount in damages from Grissom and operators of the Trafalgar Square complex. The operators include an insurance company, a management company and two officers of the management company.

The lawsuit alleges that Grissom killed Brown while employed by the complex and that apartment managers were negligent in hiring and retaining him.

Brown and her roommate, Christine Rusch, both 22, were living at Trafalgar Square when they disappeared June 26, 1989.

Grissom, 30, was convicted in November of murdering Brown, Rusch and Joan Butler of Overland Park, who disappeared from her apartment a week before Brown and Rusch.

He was sentenced to life in prison with no chance of parole for more than 100 years.

Testimony at his trial showed that Grissom had been given a pass key that opened most of the apartments.

Finney

Second, Finney proposed reviewing construction and material expenses on highway construction and renovation. She said during a recessionary period, the state should get better contractual rates from contractors and save money. This money can be used to fund other areas of the state budget.

Third, Finney favored the funding of the final year of the Margin of Excellence. She said expects, however, to get something back from the universities.

Finney outlined a program called Creating Tomorrow. This program will use the talents campuses have to solve the problems of the state.

"A focal point of this is to get Kansans communicating and cooperating," she said.

Finney also mentioned her support of public initiative and referendum. She said the people in Kansas should be given the opportunity to participate in constitutional amendments.

"The College of Human Ecology is extremely important for Creating Tomorrow," Finney said. "There are tremendous resources in this college to help the people of Kansas."

After Finney finished speaking, Barbara Stowe, dean of human ecology, said there are 1300 students currently studying in the college, separated into four departments. The college is a mission-orientated part of the University.

"We are concerned about the development of human beings," Stowe said.

The four department heads, faculty and student leaders were then given the opportunity to tell Finney about their respective departments. They each gave Finney literature about their departments and special projects they were currently involved in.

Stowe said they invited Finney to show her the programs and potential the University has for helping meet some of her objectives for Kansas.

said. Children that haven't had parents deployed may also attend discussions.

Fallon said she doesn't see a lot of fear among the children.

Fallon recalls one little boy saying, "My daddy went to talk to that Saddam guy in the Virgin Gulf."

Two large yellow ribbons are tied to the pillars at the entrance of the school. Each ribbon bears the signatures of elementary children. Ribbons also adorn the hallways and rooms.

So far, the children's parents are still alive, but the threat of death is always a possibility. Facing death isn't something you can plan, you just have to deal with it humanly, Barnes said.

"If you were to ask me today what I'd do, I don't know what I'd do," he said. "We're just hoping to reunite families."

the people in war. This unity is especially important to the families in that community.

Displaying American flags and yellow ribbons show support of the soldiers.

"This community support helps the families not to feel so isolated," Woodford said.

When local organizations offer to do tasks such as scooping snow, it is also a help to the family. A missing family member puts a strain on the daily activities. This strain includes daily tasks.

"When someone steps in and helps with these tasks, it can ease the family tensions," said Woodford.

together the faculty and the graduate students in the College of Arts and Science. Without this program there isn't much opportunity for interaction, Nellis said.

"This institute is an excellent vehicle to provide interdisciplinary and multidisciplinary structure for carrying out research," Franke said. "It provides an environment and the tools needed to do the research."

ISBR, the graduate school and the College of Arts and Sciences will sponsor a conference March 4-5 at the K-State Union.

Minister leaves K-State position

Pastor will serve Midwest churches

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

After serving as campus minister for 18 years and being involved in various projects and social issues, the Rev. Dave Stewart has left his post.

Stewart has taken a position as minister of Christian Higher Education and Christian Social Concerns for the American Baptist Churches of the Central Region. He will travel to churches and campus ministries in the Midwest to serve as a resource person.

Stewart said he leaves his campus minister position with a lot of good feelings. He said he thinks his position has been a good experience and feels he will draw very heavily from his work here as he tries to work with others in his new position.

"I learned to appreciate the uniqueness and beauty of others who are very different from myself," he said.

As campus minister, Stewart put together a number of hunger programs with the help of some colleges and departments. From these programs, a national program titled "World Hunger Consultation" developed.

The American Baptist Denominational policy statement for world hunger was developed from representatives who attended the program. Many students helped in the development and implementation of the programs.

One of the issues Stewart said he has been concerned with is racial and ethnic equality and harmony. Stewart said he thinks until the world has harmony all citizens are hurt.

Stewart has been active in the areas of race relations by participating in Racial and Ethnic Harmony Week programs and serving on the Martin Luther King Jr. Recognition Week Committee.

While Stewart has served on the American Baptist Higher Education Board, he is exposed to reports of Martin Luther King Jr. recognition weeks from campuses from across the nation. Stewart said many universities plan only one event while K-State organizes a week full of activities.

"Kansas State far out-strips anything I've seen in other settings," he said.

Because of his efforts in race relations, Stewart became the first recipient of the Distinguished Service Award from K-State's Martin Luther King Observance Committee in 1988. Stewart said his efforts included anything that needed to be done for programs and being available as a resource person.

"I was shocked and deeply moved by the award. I felt the things I did I should have done — with no

Officials consider gulf ground war timing

Cheney meets with allied commander of gulf war, says administration hopes to minimize war losses

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's top military officials, heading for the war front, said Thursday they would seek battlefield advice on the timing of a ground attack against Iraq's army.

Defense Secretary Dick Cheney said the administration is not eager to do something foolish but there are a whole series of considerations.

Cheney and Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, were to arrive in Saudi Arabia on Friday for three days of discussions with Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf, commander of allied forces, and other military leaders on the next stage of the Persian Gulf War.

"Our hope is that we can wrap it up as soon as possible, to minimize the loss of life on all sides," the defense secretary told the House Armed Services Committee before he left. "The war can end tomorrow, if Saddam Hussein will get out of Kuwait."

Cheney and Powell are to return Sunday to brief President Bush, who will make the final decision on a ground war.

As allied bombing and artillery attacks continued, the United States held out the prospect of postwar reconstruction aid for Iraq, particularly if Saddam Hussein is gone.

Secretary of State James A. Baker III said the Middle East deserves the same spirit of multilateral commitment to reconstruction and development that the world's developed nations have shown in such areas as Europe and Latin America.

However, Baker said, "There is no suggestion on our part that the rebuilding of Iraq could proceed, if the current leadership of Iraq remained in power, to the same extent and degree that it could otherwise."

Testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the secretary said that if Saddam remained in power, we might very well be adopting different measures regarding economic embargoes and weapons controls.

Baker said, "The time of reconstruction and recovery should not be the occasion for vengeful actions against a nation forced to war by a dictator's ambition. The secure and prosperous future everyone hopes to see in the gulf must include Iraq."

Across the Capitol, Cheney and Powell explained their fact-finding mission to Saudi Arabia to the House Armed Services Committee.

"Our mission is specifically to go spend time with General Schwarzkopf, our commander, and his staff, to review the overall course of the war, to see what steps should come next and to report back to the president," Cheney said.

"Do not go forward with this escalation," implored Rep. Ron Dellums, D-Calif. "Every single feeling I have in my body is frightening, ominous and foreboding. That to go forward with escalation may very well mean a cost in human terms that stagger the imagination."

Rep. Larry Hopkins, R-Ky., said patience has been a great reward for us up until now, and he urged Cheney not to ask America's children to walk across the sand.

Cheney said, "We did everything we could to avoid war, giving Saddam five months to withdraw from Kuwait."

"We believe that it's far better and in the end it will be far less costly for the United States and our allies to deal with the threat that Saddam Hussein represents now than to wait five or six or 10 years when he had nuclear weapons," Cheney said.

"We are well aware of the responsibility we bear for the conduct of the conflict," the secretary added. "I know that it weighs very heavily on the mind of the president, certainly on General Powell and myself."

In Saudi Arabia, the commander of British forces in the gulf, Lt. Gen. Peter de la Billiere, said, "I believe the land war is inevitable." But Marine Brig. Gen. Richard Neal, a U.S. command spokesman, said, "I don't think I would attach the word inevitable to it."

In Paris, French President Francois Mitterrand said a ground war promises to take place in coming days, in any case sometime this month.

Bush called Syrian President Hafez Assad on Wednesday and Australian Prime Minister Bob Hawke on Thursday to discuss the war.

White House deputy press secretary Roman Popadiuk repeated Bush's criticism of Jordan's King Hussein for his speech Wednesday attacking the allied bombing campaign against Iraq. But he said the United States was not considering cutting off aid to Jordan.

Rally will support K-State funding

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

Several campus organizations will rally in support of the enrollment adjustment and the Margin of Excellence at 10:30 Saturday morning in front of the Statehouse in Topeka.

The rally is in response to budget cuts that last year equalled $7.6 million or 5 percent of the K-State general operating budget, said Paul Davidson, junior in arts and sciences and rally organizer.

"K-State, Emporia State and Pittsburg State all took large cuts in conjunction with large enrollment increases last year," Davidson said. "If we're not able to create some public awareness and concern about it, get students motivated to do something about it and change the way we're funded and operated, reorganization is not going to go away."

"We're going to have the same problem with students here getting an across-the-board cut-rate education. Major programs that do have much to offer will be cut out because there's just not enough money there," Davidson said.

Davidson, a spokesman for Southwind, said other groups participating in the rally are Political Reaction to Issues of the Modern Order, Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment and Ecumenical Campus Ministries.

Jonathan Morris, junior in mathematics and president of SAVE, said he hoped the rally would educate legislators.

"What I'd like to see accomplished is a message to government that we're concerned about education and that funding is a top priority," he said. "Hopefully, they'll be mindful of that when the legislature is in session."

Christopher Ralph, senior in political science and vice president of PRIMO, said K-State is expected to have a 6.4 percent enrollment increase for fiscal year 1992. The University only received $1.9 million for 1991 after the regents request of $4 million.

The University of Kansas only had a .1 percent increase and received $1.3 million after requesting $2.2 million.

"I think a lot of it is that the government didn't put higher education high on the priority list," Ralph said. "From 1987 to 1991, K-State has increased enrollment by more than 1,000 each year."

"It's getting to where teachers can't even run anything off because they don't have the money in the budget to allow it," he said.

The rally will begin at 9 a.m. in the West Stadium parking lot. From there demonstrators will form a convoy and drive to Topeka with headlights on.

"What we need is to take last year's rally in front of President Wefald's house to Topeka," Ralph said.

K-State merger waits approval

LAJEAN RAU
Staff Reporter

Testimony about the Kansas College of Technology merger heard in two committees of the state Legislature this week has led to more waiting.

"We're in a kind of holding pattern," said Sue Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald.

A Kansas Board of Regents special task force researched the future of Salina's KCT from October 1989 until May 1990, when it recommended that KCT and K-State merge.

The next step is for the legislative committees to pass the proposals on to the full Legislature.

The Senate Education Committee met Wednesday to decide whether or not to give the go-ahead for the merger. The committee heard arguments but chose to hold its decision until the Joint Building Committee resolved the funding issue, Peterson said.

The building committee reviewed options Thursday for the funding of the proposed aeronautical center — either the state would put the needed $2 million up front, or the Salina Airport Authority would build the center and enter into a lease-purchase agreement with the state.

The committee chose the second option but will not formally adopt the proposal and present it to the full Legislature until the board has a chance to review it at its Feb. 14 meeting.

"Things are going about the way we expected them to," Provost James Coffman said. "It's really anybody's guess just how long this will take. We hope action will be taken in the next two weeks. The sooner the better."

The administration has expressed concerns about the time frame involved before actual contracting, building and recruiting of students can get underway.

"If we are looking at March, that's fine," said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. "But if we are looking at May or June, we may be in trouble."

Coffman said the time it will take to get official authorization is an important factor, but things will go ahead as planned regardless of how long it takes.

"It will never be too late," he said. "The time we wait will just impact how effective we will be in the first year."

K-State and KCT's administrations said they hope to be ready to accept students to the new campus in the fall of 1992.

Senate approves Union smoking resolution

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

The debate in Student Senate Thursday night was steaming over smoking.

After a lengthy debate, Senate passed by 28-24 a resolution recommending the Union Governing Board prohibit smoking from all areas of the K-State Union. The UGB will consider the resolution Feb. 21.

Communication and compromise were repeated as those opposing the resolution voiced their concern over the issue.

Neil Payne, junior in political science, spoke on behalf of student smokers.

"We just ask that we be considered in this and be allowed to compromise," he said. "We need something that will accommodate a reasonable amount of people."

Senator Derek Nelson, sophomore in business and sponsor of the resolution, said the decision of Senate should be based on facts and not emotion.

It's not just those passing through the Union Nelson said he's trying to protect, but those who come to the Union to study for three to four hours a day and are exposed to the smoke.

Smoking also creates an expense for the Union, Nelson said.

"Each year this Union runs a tab of $8,000 to $10,000 to keep smokers. That's in custodial costs alone," he said.

Cabinet member Kevin Graham, junior in political science, rebutted Nelson's statement. He said he did not understand how the Union fee, which is paid by the students, could afford to spend $8,000 per year on custodial costs.

Graham said it would be cheaper and more beneficial to pay a one-time cost of $15,000 for a new ventilation system that would allow smokers inside the building.

City council bans revealing bikinis

PALM SPRINGS, Calif. (AP) — There will be a little less skin during the annual invasion by students celebrating spring break — the city council has banned G-string bikinis, bared breasts and exposed male buttocks.

The prohibitions adopted Wednesday are among a half dozen new measures that Mayor Sonny Bono, the pop singer turned politician, termed courageous.

Revealing G-string bikinis, termed a distraction to motorists, will be banned year-round in public areas and on private grounds that can be seen from public areas, officials said.

The council also strengthened public nudity laws to prohibit women from baring their breasts and men from exposing their buttocks in public.

Cruising on some main thoroughfares will be prohibited during traffic gridlock, and motorcycles will be barred from certain areas, the council ruled.

Guilty-pleader found innocent

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — A woman who originally pleaded guilty to murdering a man and then withdrew the plea has been found innocent.

Linda Brown admitted stabbing Keith Wright, 19, but said she did it accidentally.

Shortly after the January 1990 stabbing, Brown pleaded guilty. In November, a judge agreed to allow her to withdraw her guilty plea.

Liquor stores request discounts

EMPORIA (AP) — Big liquor stores in Kansas want the state to allow them wholesale discounts for volume purchases of booze. Owners of about 20 stores with the largest sales in Kansas decided Wednesday to push for the discounts, which they said would not require a change in state law.

"What I'm saying is, five cases is a different purchase than one case," said John Webb, owner of Webb Fine Wines in Lawrence and organizer of the meeting.

The state now bans discounts on wholesale liquor sales, meaning small stores pay the same wholesale prices as big stores.

Webb said the rule singles out the liquor industry because other businesses are allowed volume discounts.

The retailers planned to invite wholesale liquor distributors and the president of the Kansas Retail Liquor Dealers Association to another meeting Feb. 20 to ask for support for the discount plan.

Teen-ager pleads guilty to 9 counts

WICHITA (AP) — The next to last defendant in a July 21 crime spree that ended in the rape and stomping death of a woman has pleaded guilty.

Harabia Johnson, 18, Wichita, pleaded guilty in Sedgwick County District Court Thursday to nine felony counts including first-degree murder, aggravated kidnapping, rape and aggravated arson.

He also pleaded guilty to aggravated battery and aggravated arson in connection with two incidents that occurred while he was in jail.

In return for the pleas, prosecutors agreed to recommend a sentence of two consecutive life terms plus 30 years, said Nola Foulston, district attorney. That would make Johnson eligible for parole in 45 years when he is 63 years old.

Johnson was the fourth defendant convicted in the rape and slaying of Roseanna "Pat" Johnson.

Businesses to sponsor Storm parade

The city of Concordia will have a Desert Storm parade 2 p.m. Saturday in downtown Concordia.

Carol Jean Garlow, event co-coordinator, said the parade will be sponsored by most Concordia businesses. There will be supporters and participants from throughout north-central Kansas.

Garlow said the supporters of the parade include USD 333, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars and its auxiliaries, the Glen Elder Lions Club and the Beloit and Jewell High School bands.

"Concordia should put together a parade to show our support for President Bush and the coalition, now that we are in the war," Garlow said.

Coalition to sponsor discussion

The Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East is sponsoring the second in a series of panel discussions on the Persian Gulf War at 2 p.m. Saturday at the Douglass Community Center, 901 Yuma.

Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics and panel moderator, said the discussion will examine issues arising out of the war including the percentage of minorities serving in the American forces deployed in the gulf and the relationship between the war and Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Rahman said the goal of the forum is to discuss questions raised by the audience, and people with opinions for or against the war are invited to attend.

The panel discussion is free and open to the public.

The coalition plans to sponsor a third panel discussion at 3 p.m. Feb. 16 in the Manhattan Library, Juliette and Poyntz.

Local groups assist parents

Tips for parents during Desert Storm

Here are 12 tips to help parents with their children while they have spouses deployed in Saudi Arabia.

1. Realize you cannot protect children from hearing or seeing information about the war.
2. Pay attention to how information about the war affects your children.
3. Provide simple explanations of what children see or hear about the war.
4. Maintain your children's schedules of familiar activities as much as possible.
5. Reassure children about their safety.
6. Get close to your children when they might be frightened about what they see or hear.
7. Read or tell stories to your children that inspire determination and hope.
8. Present positive models of Middle Eastern people and the Muslim religion.
9. Reduce "media fever" by limiting your preoccupation with television and radio reports of the war.
10. Help your children maintain a sense of contact with the absent parent.
11. Show your children how to calm themselves when they are upset.
12. Reach out to others for support.

War is a difficult concept for anyone to understand, so imagine how hard it is for a child.

And parents all over the United States are finding they must answer questions they may not know how to approach.

But there are several local groups that address these modern problems and are able to help parents answer the questions that might be troubling their children.

One agency that is available to all residents of Kansas is the Kansas Coalition Against Child Abuse located in Wichita. The coalition consists of employees and volunteers who field phone calls from parents in need of a counselor.

"The agency is a 24-hour help-line that takes in crisis calls from parents in need," said Jennifer Blickenstaff, a volunteer intern for the coalition and a Wichita State University student. "In many cases concerning the war, the parent may not realize that it's the war that has brought on added stress."

The coalition receives many calls from parents in the Fort Riley area. The calls are coming from the parent whose spouse is serving in the Persian Gulf, Blickenstaff said.

Everyday situations are blown out of proportion because the parent is upset because of the absence of the spouse.

"Most of the parents feel isolated," Blickenstaff said. "We get people who are yelling and very confused. We try and calm them down so that they can rationally deal with their children's questions."

At K-State, there are several professors with the department of human development who are experts in family studies.

John Murray, head of Department of Human Development and Family Studies and president of the American Psychological Association's division of child, youth and family services, said it's alright for children to watch the war news on television, but advises parents not to let their children camp in front of the TV set.

"Parents should discuss with kids the difference between the violence they see on regular programs and the violence shown on the news," Murray said. "First, parents must organize their own feelings so they can express them to the children."

He said parents need to set the war in context and make sure the children realize the war is a reality and not some fictitious TV show.

Since many children have a strong fear about the war, Murray said parents must periodically assure children they are safe.

Several professors on campus have developed a packet titled "Weathering Desert Storm, Helping Families During Crisis." The packet — released Feb. 5 — contains many self-help programs as well as 12 steps to guiding children and parents through the Persian Gulf War.

This particular section was prepared by Charles Smith, a professor in human development and family studies.

Smith said children can be hidden victims in this unfolding tragedy of war. They may be confused by the information they hear and see on television.

Children can feel their parents' anger, fear or sadness, he said. Unable to put these feelings into words, children may suffer quietly — overlooked by parents who are preoccupied with their own distress.

The packet is available through local county extension agents.

War prompts military to increase foot patrols, spot checks

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Security at military installations has increased across the nation, and Fort Riley is no exception.

Maj. Lance Luftman, police operations officer at Fort Riley, said most of the security changes were implemented in August and have been up and down since the 1st Infantry Division went on alert in November.

Some of the changes include increased foot patrols, increased patrols of housing areas and occasional nighttime spot checks for motorists coming on to post.

Despite the increases in security, Luftman said he perceives no real danger to Fort Riley.

"Right now there is no known threat to Fort Riley," he said, "but the idea is that we've got a lot of households and a lot of heads of households gone, and that definitely increases the concern of the families."

"What we're trying to do is make the families at Fort Riley feel secure, and I think we've been very successful."

That success includes establishing neighborhood watch programs in residential areas. Luftman said the programs are just as important as increased military police patrols.

What we're trying to do is make the families at Fort Riley feel secure.

—Maj. Lance Luftman
Fort Riley police operations officer

Luftman also said MP's have been working with Geary County law enforcement bodies and the Riley County Police Department to ensure the base is secure. The added security keeps the base aware of possible terrorist threats but also guards against criminal activity.

"I don't ignore the possibility of terrorists," Luftman said. "If I was in New York City or Los Angeles, I may be a little bit more concerned, but in the heart of Kansas, we're a lot more secure."

Crime, however, has gone down in Fort Riley and Junction City. In fact, Junction City has reported as much as a 30-percent decrease in crimes. That statistic reflects a 12,500 decreased population after the deployment, Luftman said.

But Luftman said decreases in crime are no reason for him to slack off. He has moved police around to more populated areas.

"Custer Hill is damn near a no man's land, so I don't have to have the number of patrols up there as I did when the troops were around," he said. "We've concentrated our patrols around the housing areas and increased the number of walking patrols."

Fort Riley is still a relatively safe place for the families of troops, Luftman said.

"If a direct threat against Fort Riley were identified, I can assure you we would implement some very stringent security measures," he said. "Thank God that threat does not exist."

Purple Heart awarded in gulf war

LAURA BIRRELL
Collegian Reporter

Only one Purple Heart has been awarded to a soldier in Operation Desert Storm.

"This Purple Heart was awarded to a U.S. Marine Corps medical corpsman," said Howard Hicks, of the U.S. Pentagon.

If more Purple Hearts have been awarded, the public may not find out for some time.

"We do not know about Purple Hearts being awarded right away because the paper work can take up to 30 days," said Alden Williams, professor in political science.

The Purple Heart was established when George Washington gave it to three soldiers in 1782. The first awards were simple hearts cut out of red cloth.

To receive a Purple Heart a soldier must be wounded in action. A soldier who is killed is automatically awarded one.

"You have to shed blood for this award," said Charles Gillespie, a K-State graduate who was awarded eight Purple Hearts during his two tours of Vietnam.

"A Purple Heart is something you can be very proud of because it sets you apart from other people," Gillespie said. "You feel a comradeship with other soldiers who have received one."

"People recognize the Purple Heart and know that whoever has one had to have been wounded in action," he said. "The Purple Heart has a magnetism to people, because they are in awe that something has happened to you during a war."

Columns pointless in capitalistic society

"Do you want to make more money? Sure, we all do." -- Sally Struthers, renowned economic analyst, fiscal psychologist and universally sanctioned spokeswoman.

Am I the only one disgusted by this commercial? You know, the one where Sally Struthers offers probing insight into the nature of America, the nation of the easy-chair capitalist, compelling each one of us to re-examine our personal financial status.

It seems simple enough. Job not fulfilling? Been wanting to put slip covers on your favorite pieces of furniture? Or maybe you just want a little extra-curricular cash to rent the Star Wars trilogy? What it comes down to is if you don't like who you are, where you are, what you own or what you're doing right now, why not try TV/VCR repair?

Now please don't take me too literally here. I'm not advocating the abolition of televisions, video cassette recorders, repair positions or even correspondence schools. There will always be a need for home entertainment. What I am calling into question is the fundamental tenets seemingly held in the promotional of Sally's employers.

To me, I see the rationale going something like this:

a.) I (the person in charge of promotions, that is) am not satisfied with my own personal socio-economic position.

b.) America is a dogmatically capitalistic society filled with a proletariat that is constantly being conditioned toward aspirations of wealth and a better standard of living.

c.) Everyone wants to make more money.

d.) Everyone listens to and respects anyone who has ever been on a TV series.

e.) Most Americans own a television set.

Therefore, a conclusion can be made to the effect that:

f.) I will satisfy my want for money and status by manifesting this same desire in the viewing public with the help of commercials by a respected public personality, namely Sally Struthers.

It doesn't take a doctorate in philosophy to follow this deduction from their standpoint, but does it make sense to those of us who must endure the 30-second spot?

Well, I sure can imagine someone coming up with a.) and e.). Proposition b.), amid somewhat socialist overtones, seems to be widely accepted (at least by my roommates and I). Alarming, d.) perhaps carries more truth than I want it to, although I certainly wouldn't choose Sally Struthers as the cornerstone of my ad campaign. She's about as successful with acting as I am with relationships, but that's another story.

Roblin Meeks

Collegian Columnist

What does scare the hell out of me is that premise c.) is left sitting there innocently like a smiling TV evangelist, and I can imagine someone thinking our ultimate impetus in America is to become "dirty, rotten, filthy, stinking rich," to borrow a repugnant well-known idiom.

Why? Because, in my opinion, there appears to be some unwritten American equation close to: wealth + power + real estate + social status = success story. I also think much of this is due to the fact that we continue to "pedestal-ize" the big bread winners, i.e. actors, professional athletes, larger-than-life musicians, game-show hosts and the like, to dangerously deistic proportions.

Here again, I'm not saying these aren't noble pursuits. I'd be lying if I said I didn't shoot baskets as a kid against my own ima-inary Magic Johnson, or I didn't try to get David Letterman to speak at my high school graduation. And not so long ago, I can remember driving to college with hopes of graduating with a high grade point average and a bushel-basket full of letters from prospective employers offering outrageously high starting salaries. From those letters I thought I'd just pick one, get hired, make loads of cash, open an IRA and — POOF! — instant American dream. I'm told it can still happen.

What I did discover upon arriving at K-State, much to my previous dismay, was a killer love of the humanities, a veritable well-spring of cynicism and a heightened respect for people who believe there is more to life than a raise. I met architecture students, for example, who spend 36-hour days constructing intricate models often times to only have them critiqued to cardboard, and these people won't receive Joe Montana-size salaries. I have also seen English majors who did no less than what they wanted throughout their college careers only to wind up pumping gas at various Shop Quik's in the Manhattan metropolitan area. Est-ce que c'est la vie?

Presently, I know several students who are on the verge of graduation who have prepared themselves for "crap-shoot" careers, namely writing, teaching, free-lancing, and yes, philosophizing. Many of them I'm sure will be "successful" in life by American standards. Others will not. Most, I think, will be happy with their professional performance.

I know it's weird. I came to college wanting to be rich. Now I'm in a major that only provides the big bucks in comedy (both Steve Martin and Woody Allen were philosophy majors). The thing I'm probably most qualified to do if I were to graduate right now is to teach a graduate-level course in cynicism. At this moment, I'm just more worried about President Bush's budget proposal to increase Star Wars funding by $1.6 billion than I am about putting milk on my table when I'm 30. And no, I haven't suffered a severe blow to the head, and yes, my views will probably change in time.

Well, for those of you who were looking for a point, thesis or theory to this article beyond the selling out of a bad actor, I'll lay one out just for you. Different things appeal to different people, and not everyone wants to have painfully large amounts of financial security, but almost everyone wants to be happy. For some that means being wealthy, to others it just means being healthy.

For those of you who think like me, you probably realize that like columns and capitalism, some things that seem to have a point are indeed pointless.

Politicians hope to avoid bungling tax for third time

Leave it to politicians to make something confusing even more so with the passage of a car tax bill.

It's amazing the alphabet could stump the state legislators so much they completely reversed what they were trying to fix.

The result is a tax inequity.

Previously, those whose last names begin with the letter Z paid more than people whose names begin with the letter A.

It all starts at the time car owners pay their taxes.

Those people whose names begin with A pay taxes and renew their auto registrations in February, but people whose last names begin with W, X, Y or Z don't renew until December.

The tax inequities exist because of staggered renewal dates in connection with car depreciation. People whose names started with Z had to pay more for the extra 11 months of depreciation and at a higher tax rate.

Confusing at best.

This inequity lead officials to attempt to change the taxing system. They decided to set a uniform depreciation date for all vehicles.

But they didn't take into account that the mill levy from two years earlier is used as the rate by which motor vehicles are taxed in 1991.

In effect, those with names toward either end of the alphabet are still paying different amounts, even with the new tax bill.

What the legislators should have done is wipe out the system and start over. With all of the ins and outs of the current system, which takes its lead off the old, no one — not even those who work in the automobile registration office — can make out hide nor hair of what is what.

Legislators should be looking for some way to set a specific tax rate across the board. This way, no matter what the letter at the beginning of the last name, everyone would pay the same amount.

It looks like such a plan may be in the works with Senate Bill 9 under consideration in the Senate's Taxation and Assessment Committee. This bill would make depreciation values and mill levy rates take effect for everyone Jan. 1.

But in true legislative fashion, a simple solution such as this will likely turn into a confusing nightmare for taxpayers — again.

Lest we forget

Editor,

When my ancestors came to America, they did not come here on the Mayflower, nor did they arrive at Ellis Island to find a so-called "American Dream." My people came here in chains. They were beaten, castrated, exploited and sold as slaves to work for the barbaric Caucasian settlers.

Back then we weren't considered Americans. According to the Constitution, black people were considered to be three-fifths of a person. An ignorant person may say that's in the past. But have you ever asked yourself why Jewish people won't let you forget about the horrors they encountered in Germany? The Jewish people want no one to forget what they went through. Neither do the black people want others to forget slavery.

For if these travesties are forgotten long enough, they may happen again. For the same reason history is studied, to prevent it from being cyclical.

In my opinion, if black people were considered to be Americans, Martin Luther King Jr. wouldn't have had to demonstrate during the 1960s. If we were Americans, Rosa Parks would not have been thrown off the bus, and the Black Panther Party wouldn't have needed to come into existence.

In conclusion, I would like to quote the words of the late Malcolm X: "I'm not going to sit at your table and watch you eat, with nothing on my plate, and call myself a diner. Sitting at a table doesn't make you a diner. Being born in America doesn't make you an American."

Peace starts at home

Editor,

After reading "Protesters victims of threats" in the Collegian last week, I feel compelled to write this letter. According to the article, in one incident, four men — that's right, four men — went up to "harass," or rather assault, one female activist.

How revolting!

Now, demonstrators are receiving telephone threats from fellow Americans ... America, home of the brave and land of the free. Freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, etc. I thought these rights were loved and respected by U.S. citizens of all types! Yes, even those with opposing views. (But, obviously not everyone.)

When the gulf war started, Walter Cronkite himself told the nation that we all need to be respectful and open-minded of each others' feelings about this crisis. But it must be a two-way street.

One of these "harassers" told Wendy Herdman, the aforementioned assault victim, that war protesters shouldn't be allowed to live in the country. (The U.S.A., I presume.) Just a little hypocritical!?! These flag wavers might try living in some unstable South American dictatorship (like Chile) or communist country (if there are any more — oh yeah, China) where people don't have such freedoms as we do. When (or if) they come back, I'll bet they won't take our First Amendment rights for granted.

Actually, John Exdell, who was threatened on the phone, may be fairly accurate in calling their threats "fascist inclinations." After all, their narrow-mindedness is quite similar to that of an Iraqi leader named Saddam Hussein.

After all, all Mr. Exdell, Ms. Herdman, Kale Baldock, myself, and many others want is peace: in the Middle East, in the Baltic states, in South Africa (just to name a few), and, last but not least, peace right here in Manhattan, Kan. We can only hope.

Objectivity missing

Editor,

We thought the Collegian was a paper that viewed events objectively. However, since last semester, it has come to our attention that the musical reviewers on the Collegian staff do not like any type of rock, pop rock or heavy metal. Several times when a metal album/concert has been reviewed, it has received bad ratings. We don't call this objective.

Eric Melin's review of the Poison concert, along with his so-called experts — the Andys, was composed of nothing but "nit-picky" critiques. First, we are glad that Poison's concert was "well rehearsed" being that they have been on tour for over six months. Also, just because the Andys do a "Metal-head" show on a local radio station, that does not make them experts. The experts, if that is even a word to be used unless the person is Dick Clark, are the fans.

At the beginning of the review, why didn't Melin just call Poison Milli Vanilli? At least Poison writes their own songs and does not lip sync their lead vocals. A lot of bands use recorded background vocals. So sue Bobby Dall for walking away from his microphone. You must have been scraping pretty hard to find something to put in your review.

We are not sure if anyone else was offended, but we did not appreciate being called prepubescent, and we were not with our parents. We are college students. And looking around Bramlage Coliseum, that's the majority of what we saw — college students screaming, singing, dancing and having a good time listening to some good music. If we looked hard enough, we could have picked you and the Andys out of the crowd, sitting, writing and checking your shoes for bubblegum.

Call us crazy, but we would not have paid $40 to see Poison twice had we not found it worthy of our money. I guess it all comes down to a matter of opinion. Our key word for your review was "ridiculous." Maybe if you did not have to go to the concert knowing that you had to review it, you would of had as good as a time as the rest of us.

Station criticized

Editor,

In reference to Cynthia Schmidt's letter Feb. 6, her point about the Union Station being a bar and not a study area is well taken. I have to admit I was pleased when the powers-that-be decided to take the most popular study area on campus and turn it into a non-alcoholic bar for people to party in, a place that is desperately needed when Aggieville is a distant 300 yards away.

I also like your suggestion about studying in the library. I'm certain that Farrell is already over-crowded, as all this expansion talk may lead us to believe. I'm sure the addition of all those extra bodies will create a wonderfully cozy environment that is very conducive to learning. We also will probably get to know each other on a more intimate level, which could lead to world peace.

I am interested to know, however, when the Union Stateroom will ban studying. It is a cafeteria after all, and cafeterias are for eating, not studying. We must do all we can to drive students out of the STUDENT Union. All students do is study and spend money on drinks and food, filling the financial coffers of the Union. We'll have none of that in our STUDENT Union. We have to draw the line somewhere.

Lastly, I am pleased to hear the people who work in the Union Station are having a lot of fun, since they're the only K-Staters I've ever actually seen there. I'm glad to see we're getting our money's worth.

Skoog should stay

Editor,

Margaret Schmidt's letter in rebuttal to Ed Skoog (Collegian, Feb. 6) made me ill. Schmidt shows an appalling lack of understanding of the principles on which this country was based.

Schmidt is dead wrong if she thinks America "would get along just fine" without Ed Skoog and John Prine. Democracy means having the right to dissent and express opinions on both sides of an issue — whether it be the proliferation of stickers in our society or the Persian Gulf conflict. It means that Margaret Schmidt can express herself until she's blue in the face — it's her right.

Schmidt's "love it or leave it" sentiment would be more at home in Iraq. I shudder to think what this country would be like if there was no tolerance for dissent.

In closing, some thoughts on free speech and misguided patriotism:

"I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." — Voltaire.

"One of the great attractions of patriotism — it fulfills our worst wishes. In the person of our nation we are able, vicariously, to bully and cheat. Bully and cheat, what's more, with a feeling that we are profoundly virtuous." — Aldous Huxley.

R. Cleveland Gillespie graduate student in journalism

Reverse action

Editor,

While I was in the K-State Union studying the other night, I was interrupted by some people being loud. I realized it was no fault of theirs, because the dining room of the Union is a place to go relax and socialize if one desires to. Then I began to remember a place where one could go to eat, drink and study in quiet. A wonderful place with a pleasant unwritten rule of silence. An almost fun place to study. This, of course, was the Catskeller. I really miss this place.

Some might say to just go to the library, but it's very restricted when it comes to food and drink. There is no place you can go and get a coke, some popcorn and sit in silence.

I have looked at the new Union Station and it's nice, but we don't need it. If I'm going out, the last place I'm going is to the Union. I think the Union's "dry bar" is a big, big waste of time, money and especially space. The fact that it's empty most of the time should back up this opinion.

It just seems funny that the Union has many ballrooms, lecture rooms, offices, TV rooms, a bar and everything in between, but a person is hard-pressed to find somewhere quiet to study. Please somebody, rip out all the useless speakers and bars, and install some good tables and good lighting so we can have our beloved Catskeller back.

Column rebutted

Editor,

It is obvious that Ed Skoog is not in favor of using yellow ribbons to show support for the troops in Saudi Arabia. It is also quite obvious that Skoog has no idea of the pain generated when a loved one is sent off to war.

If he did, then he would realize that when an event like war occurs there is little anyone can do to show they care except by tying ribbons on a tree or a fence or by putting a sticker on a car. This is especially true for the children of the soldiers being shipped overseas. Forty-seven of the children at Bluemont School are having to deal with the loss of their dads and moms for several months, a year or possibly forever.

Act locally

Editor,

As the gulf war rages and oil slicks spread, most of us are becoming more aware of the need to save energy, money and the environment.

The University could save considerably and make people here more alert, healthy and comfortable if overheating were corrected (i.e. Union Station at 75 to 85 degrees Fahrenheit day after day, similarly Farrell Library and Umberger and Eisenhower Halls etc). Surely thermostats shouldn't be set above 70 degrees in winter.

Many hallways and empty classrooms and dining areas are brightly lit throughout the afternoon, evening and even the night.

Production of styrofoam destroys the ozone layer; let's replace it with reusable plates, cups and glasses. Let's encourage and implement such suggestions.

Glenna Burckel
faculty wife and temporary instructor

Students to rally

Editor,

Last November, this campus witnessed one of the largest student protests since the peace movements back in the 1960s. However, that protest was not against U.S. foreign policy, but an academic policy called reorganization.

The crowd, with their "Hell no, we won't go" chants, may have vanished, but the dilemma remains. Reorganization is not dead; it has only been tabled. The miraculous money to curtail reorganization has not fallen from the sky, the number of excess students has not dropped and the colleges of Architecture and Human Ecology have not fallen off the face of the K-State campus. The result, once again for the fourth year in a row, is across-the-board budget cuts to all departments. The question remains, what about

Campus voices

What do you think the real meaning behind a yellow ribbon is?

"To support the troops. I think it is a good idea, and it keeps their morale up. I think it is important that they know we support them."

Stu Robson, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine

"It shows support for our people in the gulf. It shows them respect, and I think it is a good idea for us to show that kind of unity as a campus."

Carleton Spencer, freshman in mechanical engineering

"I think it shows support for the troops, but I don't think it necessarily means you support the war."

Mary Wood, instructor in the English Language Program

(February 5, 1991)

next year?

K-State can no longer prosper in the academic arena if the Kansas Legislature continues to falter on the economic necessities that once nourished this institution. We must convince the leaders and the citizens of this state that higher education should be placed at the top of the priority list, instead of highways. A smooth highway only makes a ride to a university outside of the state more comfortable.

I encourage the students to all rally for the Margin of Excellence, enrollment adjustments and the full funding of base budgets this Saturday at the State House. We will begin at 9 a.m. in the West Stadium parking lot with the convoy of cars to Topeka. We will rally at 10:30 a.m. in front of the capital and the eyes of Topeka, Wichita and Kansas City media. The rally will end at noon, in order for all of us to return to Manhattan to root for our K-State Wildcats as they take on the Iowa State Cyclones.

Form car-pools with your friends and dig out those old T-squares, posters, signs and T-shirts. Let's give a damn about our education. Let's make this a positive rally, but more importantly, let's make sure this will be the last rally.

Tom Noravong (right), sophomore in electrical engineering, strains against John Isermann, freshman in arts and sciences, in the final match of the men's residence hall flyweight division of the intramural wrestling tournament Thursday night in Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. Noravong defeated Isermann, but lost in the All-University title match.

Battle on a Table

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

With the exception of a lack of empty beer bottles and a dimly lit room for the competition, the All-University wrestling tournament at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex went as well as could be expected — outside a bar.

"This year we increased the number of members per team to six," said Steve Martini, associate director of Recreational Services. "With that increase, we drew a lot of the fraternities and sororities to this event. We had close to 90 matches last year. This year we had more than 100."

One of the winners in the tournament was Chad Cecil, freshman in pre-law.

Cecil might have had a bit of advantage going into the tournament. Last year, he took part in a tournament when he was passing through Dodge City.

"Well, it sounded like a fun thing to do at the time," Cecil said. "It was at a bar I was at, and the winner received $150. I was surprised as to how well I did. Actually, I just used the money to pay for the drinks that night."

For Cecil, who was the winner of the All-University flyweight division, the night went relatively easy. In four matches, he won in 10 seconds or less.

Winner of the All-University lightweight division was Brian Bock, sophomore in business. This was his first time in the event, and he said that he has plans of competing again next year.

"Well, my arm hurts now," Bock said. "I'm sure I'll be back next year. As for now, I guess I'll have to drink my beer with my left hand tonight."

In the women's division, the numbers were down from last year but the results showed Michon Weingartner as the winner again in the 136 and above category. In the other women's bracket — 135 and below — it was Kristin Roberts, freshman in life sciences.

The winners for the men's independent division were as follows: flyweight, Cecil defeating Roland Myers; middleweight, Mike Rider defeating John Buessing; lightweight, Barry Park defeating Reid Bork; heavyweight, Randy Cohen defeating John Wington.

The winners for the residence hall division were as follows: flyweight, Tom Noravong defeated John Isermann; lightweight, David Fraas defeated Mark Cunningham; middleweight, Bill Came winner by forfeit; heavyweight, John Rosendale defeated Chris Hundven.

In the greek division: flyweight, Jim Roberts defeated Jason Volk; lightweight, Brian Bock defeated Travis Rome; middleweight, Derrick Brown defeated Kevin Kolbeck; heavyweight, Lane Massey defeated Scott Haase.

Other finalists for All-University titles were middleweight Barry Park and heavyweight Lane Massey.

Lady Cats need win over ISU

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

Crunch time has arrived for the Lady Cat basketball team.

With five games remaining in the regular season, two on the road and three at home, the Lady Cats need to regain the enthusiasm they had in back-to-back wins over Oklahoma State and Kansas that landed them in a tie for the conference lead.

On Wednesday night the seventh-place Lady Sooners of Oklahoma put on a home-court display, just as the K-State men's team did in their victory over Oklahoma Tuesday night in Bramlage Coliseum, to knock the Lady Cats into the second-place slot.

This weekend the Lady Cats hope to rebound from their worst defeat of the season and capture a much-needed road win to stay in contention for the league title. K-State travels to Ames, Iowa, to face Iowa State in a 1 p.m. contest. The game will be televised live on Prime Network.

"Personally, I want to play another game and get (the Oklahoma game) out of my system. If we go up there and play hard, then the game at OU will be out of my mind," Lady Cats Coach Susan Yow said. "This is a big road game. If we don't win it, we will drop to third place. It is our biggest road game to date."

Iowa State visited Manhattan back on Jan. 19, and handed the Lady Cats a 75-66 defeat. Iowa State sits in the third place slot in the conference with a 10-11 record and 5-4 in the conference. Yow said she is expecting another hard-fought game.

"We will have our hands full. In the loss to them, we played very flat, particularly in the second half," she said. Their press changed the pace of the game and was very effective against us.

"In the back of their minds they think we won't be able to handle the press," Yow said. "We need to do that and not play flat."

K-State needs a resurgence from Diana Miller and Nadira Hazim. Against OU, Miller was 2-of-7 from the field in a seven-point performance, and Hazim went 7-of-21 netting 16 points after seven straight 20-plus outings.

"We need to play hard ourselves. We need to have a complete game both offensively and defensively," Yow said. "I expect a very physical game and a very aggressive game. If Iowa State could win the game, they could be in a spot to contend for second place. If they lose, it will put them two games out, which would be hard to come back from."

Yow feels that K-State needs to regain the confidence they had before the Oklahoma loss. Before the loss, she knew exactly where the team was headed, but now does not know where it is at.

"I know we are not going to win 100 percent of the games. Each time you go out is a new day," Yow said. "This team is at the point where if they are confident, they will win. I don't know where we are right now. We can't let one game make a season."

A Lady Cats victory, however, could still put them in contention for the league title. Of the five remaining games, they play the other top five teams in the conference, which are all separated by only two games.

UNLV, Arkansas prepared for titanic battle

Scott Paske

Sports Reporter

Set all your beliefs about the home court advantage aside Sunday.

If you don't, top-ranked UNLV will.

The Runnin' Rebels and their 30-game winning streak travel to Barnhill Arena for the long-awaited showdown with No. 2 Arkansas.

The Razorbacks, after winning their 20th straight game Thursday at Houston, enter the game with a sizzling 23-1 record. UNLV is spotless at 19-0.

So good is this matchup that the campout for general admission tickets began a few days ago outside the arena. One major TV network is going to bat in the ratings game against another that is showing the NBA All-Star contest.

Tip-off is 11 a.m. for the Rebs and Hogs, 12:30 p.m. for the pros. And there may not be a vast difference in talent levels of the two games.

Arkansas is good (as K-State players can attest), and with six juniors who see plenty of action, the Hogs are a virtual shoe-in to be next year's preseason favorite for the national championship. Wildcat fans will get a chance to verify that, as Arkansas is scheduled to play K-State in Bramlage Coliseum next season.

But that will be then, and this is now. And THE TEAM, for now, is UNLV.

Many people feel the Rebels will defend their national title with only one blemish, which is expected to come Sunday. As good as Coach Nolan Richardson's team is, I just can't see it happening.

No way.

UNLV isn't any junior varsity for the Sacramento Kings. These guys could hold their own against, if not beat, several of the NBA's doormats.

It's a shame the Rebels aren't allowed to prove it. Instead, they're forced to take it out on NCAA opponents.

The home court, a lot of foreclosures say, will be the difference. Maybe Barnhill makes Todd Day's three-pointers more potent, Oliver Miller's dunks more vicious and the Hogs' pressure defense unbeatable.

But don't those three basketball terms — three-pointers, dunks and pressure defense — seem familiar if you've seen UNLV on television? Anderson Hunt's long-range bombs, Larry Johnson's powerful inside play and Stacey Augmon's blanketing defense have been prevalent all year.

Nobody in college basketball does those things better. Give me those guys and a couple others, and I'll come play in your gym any day.

UNLV has already proven it doesn't fear foreign territory. Included in the Rebs' perfect season are road wins at Louisville, Michigan State and UC-Santa Barbara.

Freedom Hall, Auburn Hills Palace and the UCSB Events Center are lion's dens for most opponents, but the Rebels rolled through each building without blinking.

If there's a major difference in what UNLV must do to win Sunday, it will be to stay focused for 40 minutes. Arkansas' keep-comin'-at-ya' philosophy won't allow it.

There have been times this year that UNLV has looked bored, almost like they need a challenge to stay interested. Once the Rebels get cornered, however, it's like watching dobermans attack a criminal.

The Rebels have played out 30-second scenarios all year that are almost unfair to other NCAA teams: a two-point lead goes to five on a three-pointer by Hunt; UNLV's press forces a turnover. Augmon scores on a layup; the opponent breaks the press, but puts up a wild shot; Johnson rebounds.

UNLV gets a 3-on-1 fast break, but instead of scoring inside, Greg Anthony buries another three-pointer.

Suddenly, the lead is 10 points. The Rebels have you where they want you. Forget about coming back. Game over.

UNLV's explosiveness was highlighted in a 103-73 rout of Duke in last year's national championship game. And with a team that includes Johnson, Augmon, Hunt, Anthony, George Ackles and Elmore Spencer, Coach Jerry Tarkanian's bomb remains deadly.

Arkansas won't be able to stop it. All the Hogs can do is try to keep up.

They won't be able. Sunday's final score: UNLV 94, Arkansas 79.

Tennis team hopes for rebound

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Despite coming off a weekend full of disappointing losses, the tennis team carries its usual enthusiasm for competition and development into an equally tough trip this weekend to South Bend, Ind.

Dropping all 18 matches in two days of dual competition with Illinois and Arkansas last weekend at Topeka, the squad began the spring season on a sour note. With three days of matches with Purdue, Notre Dame and Drake, Coach Steve Bietau said he anticipates more tough challenges on the horizon.

"If anything, the competition picks up as we go," Bietau said. "But we're excited to continue making strides and pushing ourselves. Our goal is to eventually be on this level of competition, so we've got to learn to play with these teams."

Bietau pointed to the Notre Dame squad as particularly talented, noting that the Irish have three players ranked in the nation's top 50. Nonetheless, a few bright spots in last weekend's performance were enough to keep Bietau looking forward to another shot at high-level competition.

Suzanne Sim and Michele Riniker each provided flashes of potential in singles competition, drawing praise from Bietau. Rosemary Hunter and Angie Gover, both hampered by injuries, made encouraging appearances.

"The fact that Angie and Rosemary were able to play is a good sign. Neither of them is 100 percent yet," Bietau said. "I really didn't expect for Rosemary to be able to play, but the risk for her of any re-injury is gone now, and it's just a matter of her getting stronger and in shape."

Dealing with injuries and inexperience, Bietau expects the team lineup to continue changing out of necessity. He hopes to establish some continuity in doubles competition this weekend, but noted that injuries can slow the process of settling on pairings for doubles teams.

Riniker will likely team with Gover, whose injury currently limits her to doubles action, at the No. 1 doubles spot. Bietau noted that Sim and Neili Wilcox have proven complementary in doubles and will play in the No. 2 position. Hunter will continue her gradual return by pairing with Theresa Burcham for at least some of the weekend in No. 3 doubles.

Bietau isn't disappointed by the team's slow start. With top-ranked schools on the schedule, he also re-emphasizes the team's goals.

"We always want to win. That's always an objective, but it's only one of a number of objectives," Bietau said. "We're not at a point where we have to win to keep going. We have to keep working awfully hard and making progress, but it's not a must-win situation."

Track squads split up

Meets in Nebraska, Iowa to test competing athletes

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

The K-State men's and women's track teams will be facing high-caliber competition this weekend as they divide and participate in the Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., and the Iowa State Invitational in Ames, Iowa.

The middle-distance and long-distance runners (800-meters and up) will participate in the meet in Ames, while the remaining team members will compete in Lincoln.

Head coach John Capriotti's decision to send the middle-distance and long-distance runners to Ames will allow them to run on a longer track.

He said running on a longer track will give the runners a better chance to run a time that will qualify them for nationals.

"It's a good track to run fast on," Capriotti said.

The competition at the Husker Invitational will be provided by some of the strongest track programs in the country, including Texas, Louisiana State, Alabama, USC and Brigham Young.

"The Husker Invitational is arguably the best indoor invitational in the country," he said. "It usually produces a lot of national qualifiers."

Although the teams' goal for the weekend is to better the season's previous times and distances, the high level of competition will push the athletes and give several a good chance to qualify for the NCAA indoor meet in March, Capriotti said.

"We have to take this opportunity ourselves to improve and qualify," he said.

Capriotti said he sees this weekend as an opportunity not only to improve performances and qualify athletes for nationals, but to gauge how his teams compare to competition they will face in the Big Eight and NCAA Championships.

"They will see some of the best athletes in the country this week," he said.

Capriotti said the athletes are looking forward to facing the challenging competition these meets should provide.

The Husker Invitational will be held in Bob Devaney Sports Center and the Iowa State Invitational in the ISU Recreation Center.

'Cats look to escape cellar

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

The defense didn't thrill Coach Dana Altman. The rebounding needs to be better, too. There were mental mistakes and breakdowns under pressure as well, Altman said.

So, Coach, what was it that helped the Cats to a stunning 95-70 win over Oklahoma?

"When you shoot the ball like we did against Oklahoma, it can make up for a lot of things," Altman said. "I don't know that we did anything that different from what we're used to. We just shot the ball really well."

The Wildcats ripped Oklahoma for 64 percent shooting with balanced scoring in both fast-break and half-court fashion. Good shooting makes a coach look good, said Altman, who looked a little bit like John Wooden Tuesday night.

"We hadn't been shooting the ball real well. Those shots (against Oklahoma) were really no different from the ones we've missed in previous games," Altman said. "I thought we shot the ball with a lot of confidence, and when those early ones went down, we seemed to gain more confidence as the game went on."

While nothing was new for the Wildcats against OU, the Maurice Brittian of old came through with his best effort of the season.

The old Maurice Brittian, the one Altman recruited at Georgia Tech from Hutchinson Community College, the one who came to K-State before a knee injury slowed his transition, re-emerged Tuesday with 20 points and 10 rebounds.

"I really thought he was capable of that kind of performance," Altman said of Brittian. "I really think he's capable of giving us 12 to 14 points every night out. When we have that threat that he gives us, the other teams have to think about stopping him, and that consumes a lot of the defenses' thoughts."

Brittian connected on 10-of-13 shots from the field, but his presence in the post that freed outside shooters was his most valuable contribution, Altman said.

"Mo hit a couple of inside shots and that opened it up for our perimeter game. But that's kind of a two-way street, because then the defense had to come back out, and Mo got a couple more," Altman said. "It gave us a nice inside-outside combination that we hadn't been getting."

The Wildcat center will be challenged by one of the league's best big men Saturday, Iowa State's 6-foot-9, 265 pound Victor Alexander. Alexander killed the Wildcats with 49 points in the teams' two meetings last season, and ranks second in the Big Eight with 23.7 points per contest this season.

The 8-14 Cyclones look to bounce back from an 83-62 loss to Oklahoma State on Tuesday, in which they shot just 39 percent from the field and committed 26 turnovers.

Similar to the fate of the Wildcats in their loss to Oklahoma State in January, Alexander was shackled with three first half fouls and Cowboy center Byron Houston dominated the second half.

Iowa State posted a 94-91 win over the Wildcats at Ames earlier this season, but the loss to OSU dropped the Cyclones to 2-5 in Big Eight games. This gives the Wildcats a chance to break out of the conference cellar.

"We've got to slow down Victor. He's always a big threat, and their two guards, Justus Thigpen and Doug Collins, hurt us up there (in Ames)," Altman said. "That gives them three good scorers that we've got to really contain."

Altman pointed to necessary improvement on defense and rebounding and emphasized that to hope for shooting performances like Tuesday's in every contest was unrealistic.

"We cannot count on shooting the ball like that, so we've still got to win games by trying to slow people down defensively and rebound people and hope for a good shooting effort," Altman said.

Jean Derouillere, who led the Wildcats with 23 points on 11 of 16 shooting against OU, connected on more than 50 percent of his shots for the first time since the last meeting with the Cyclones. Derouillere and Jeff Wires were the top beneficiaries of Brittian's presence and will again look for Brittian to open up the perimeter with inside production.

Things looking up under Altman

Eric Brown

Sports Reporter

In past years, my formula for spring fever has been beautiful weather plus late-season surges by the K-State basketball team.

The 'Cats recent efforts have once again spawned that attitude in me, as I'm sure they have in other die-hard, purple-blooded fans.

The play of K-State during its two-game winning streak points to the possibility of good things to come in future months. If the 'Cats can continue to shoot like they did against Oklahoma, they will bring smiles to even the hardest-to-please Wildcat fans, not to mention an extension of their season.

Yes, the 'Cats are starting to find themselves, and the entire team is rising to the occasion. The ever-improving play of Jeff Wires has now been complimented by a full deck of face cards.

Jean Derouillere has returned and the long-awaited man called "Mo" — Maurice Brittian — is finally here. Keith Amerson has regained his early-season form and is playing better than ever. It's hard to believe he's 6-4 rather than 6-8.

A newcomer to the starting lineup, Marcus Zeigler, has made his presence felt of late and with the short, but lightning quick unit, K-State is starting to gel and overmatch teams (good Big Eight teams, not just UMKC) with speed and consistently tough defense.

The 'Cats appear to be on the verge of peaking at the right time. Tournament committees always weigh the end of the season heavier than any other, a fact that can't hurt K-State. The strength of the Big Eight will also help the 'Cats, as I see possibly five teams making the field of 64, even with Mizzou on probation (they can never get past the first round anyway).

K-State's 95-70 win over OU shows that Dana Altman's up-tempo offense is getting where it needs to go. Altman deserves a hand for rescuing a well-loved but sinking ship in the U.S.S. Kruger.

I liked Lon, and he gave so much to the University. He put K-State

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN IN FOCUS

Before he gets costumed, Willie makes a new "Go" sign about 1½ hours before gametime.

ONE WILD CAT

Willie entertains the student section with a cheerleading routine during a time-out.

Kathryn Reynolds, 3, one of Willie's fans, gives him a kiss before gametime. Her parents, Merrill and Nancy, helped bake cookies for Willie's valentine surprise.

K-State student enjoys dual personality role as Willie the Wildcat

Before every home basketball game, a special figure leads the 'Cats into battle by taking a lap around the court with a K-State flag. He's Willie the Wildcat.

Willie is as much a part of K-State's tradition as the purple and white colors and the "Wabash Cannonball." Fans who come to Bramlage can expect to be entertained throughout the game by his comedic antics.

Another tradition exists. The true identity of Willie remains anonymous, and the current mascot is no different. "It's kind of an unwritten code that I have to remain anonymous," Willie said.

"There are people who know," Willie said. "I told about eight friends my sophomore year and it's just grown every year."

Although he admits being the University mascot is an important job, Willie said he believes the real stars are the team players.

"(Being the mascot) doesn't get me anywhere," Willie said. "People aren't really impressed, nor should they be — I'm not putting points on the board."

But, despite his modesty, Willie is just as outgoing and energetic out of costume as he is in. He's always entertaining.

He said it was his outgoing nature that got him interested in becoming a mascot.

"My freshman year was the last year the 'Cats played in Ahearn, and I kind of got crazy in the crowd," he said. "I dressed up like a blind referee one game and Willie took me out on the court. I thought that was pretty cool, and later some people said that I might be pretty good as Willie, so I decided to give it a shot."

Wanting to be Willie isn't enough to get the job, though, he said. There is a tryout where each candidate must perform in front of judges.

"They look basically at the overall personality you have when you have the head on," Willie said. "A big thing that's important with mascots is exaggerated emotions so the person in the 36th row can see what you're doing as well as the person in the front row. They also look at your humor and spontaneity."

This particular Willie said he had no trouble passing those tests. He did, however, find it tough trying to adjust to wearing the 30-pound Wildcat head.

"Your vision is really restricted when you're wearing the head," Willie said. "It's kind of like wearing blinders in basketball. When you walk, you just kind of move your head around so you can see where you're going and look all around."

"Sometimes I won't see a stool, and I'll trip over it," Willie said. "The thing you've got to do is make it look like you did it on purpose and hope they believe it."

Once he mastered the awkwardness of the head, he said he took it with him everywhere.

Financial assistance, jobs often necessary

PAULA BERGLUND
Collegian Reporter

Some students are financially responsible for their lives. When they run out of money and the rent is due, or if their car breaks down, they have no one to call.

These students can receive help with financial aid from the government.

Dawn Shepherd, senior in accounting and management, uses financial aid to pay tuition and buy books.

Kelly Dailey, senior in human ecology, uses financial aid to pay tuition.

Finding an understanding and flexible employer is important for success. Shepherd, who is employed by International Tours Travel Agency, works 20 to 22 hours a week and is able to keep her school and work schedules from conflicting.

Dailey, who is employed by Dillard's, works 20 to 24 hours a week. Dailey knows her work schedule a month in advance so she is aware of any conflicts before they occur.

Dailey is from Manhattan and chose to live at home during college to cut down on living expenses. Although Dailey doesn't pay rent, she does have tenant responsibilities including laundry, phone bill and food costs. Dailey is also responsible for car payments.

Both students said time management is the key to success.

"Time management is the hardest thing to learn," Dailey said. "I get a calendar and plan weeks in advance."

Dailey's work schedule doesn't always allow time for extra activities. "You can't do everything," Dailey said.

Shepherd doesn't work in the evenings or weekends. She said she uses those times to get involved in activities. This year Shepherd became a member of the dance squad and is a member of the Sigma Kappa sorority.

Both said if they are financially able, they will help their children through college, but they said their children will also work through college.

Gulf crisis increases terrorist risk

Airports respond with tightened security

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

The potential for terroristic acts is higher because of the Persian Gulf War.

Airports and airlines throughout the nation are increasing their security measures. Many of the increased security measures at the airports are readily visible.

Terry Pearson, president of Kansas State Travel, said airports are on the highest states of alert possible.

For example, at the Kansas City International Airport, the airline customers must obey many new restrictions designed to deter the threat of terrorism.

Tom McKibben, airport safety manager at KCI, said airport security has been increased, but the measures cannot be discussed.

"There can be no unattended cars or baggage, these are the two most noticeable things," McKibben said. "If they are left unattended they will be removed."

Pearson said KCI and other major airports have undertaken additional security measures.

Besides the banning of unattended vehicles at the terminals, there are also no bellhops or sky-caps to pick up luggage at the curb. Unattended luggage is forbidden not only at the curb, but also inside the airport. Someone must be with the luggage and vehicles at all times.

Customers should check in their luggage at least one and a half to two hours in advance, Pearson said. Ticket holders must show photo identification before they are scrutinized by the X-ray machine operators.

Airport security is going through every bag instead of spot checks, he said.

Laura Walker, reservations sales representative for United Airlines, said airline policy for security can't be disclosed, because it is a security risk.

Pearson said it is normal procedure for airlines to withhold details about security measures.

"They could have additional security beyond the measures observable by the public," he said.

Even with these additional security measures, business hasn't yet been hurt. Down the road, however, the war and the potential threat of terrorism will hurt the business, Pearson said.

"Customers are relieved that something is being done and the extent to ensure their safety," Pearson said.

The additional security measures undertaken by both airports and airlines shouldn't increase the costs of air travel, he said.

"The dilemma facing airlines is to keep people flying — at moderate price levels," Pearson said. "We are not going to see any major increases due to the increased security."

Jeff Lanza, FBI special agent in Kansas City, MO., said the FBI is at a higher level of awareness and the bureau is doing things it normally wouldn't to keep terrorism in check.

Lanza said the FBI would investigate all acts of terrorism.

"The threat of terrorism is always there, even if there wasn't a war in the gulf," Lanza said.

Council members discuss budget problems

KEVIN CARROLL
Collegian Reporter

At the Thursday meeting of the Multicultural Student Council, members discussed budget problems and the possibility of sending a member to the MSC national conference in Kansas City, Mo.

The MSC is a campus organization made up of 11 unrepresented minority organizations that are trying to gain recognition on the K-State campus.

"None of the other Big Eight schools have such an organization on their campus," said Tim Kamenar, a graduate student in student counseling and personal services. "The group is planning many activities that are going to be taking place in the next couple of months."

MSC President Cassandra Redmond, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, led a discussion of a MSC conference scheduled for Feb. 28-Mar. 3.

Redmond said Pat Bosco, associate vice president of institutional advancement, wants to see more multicultural students attending the conference. However, without allocations from Student Governing Association the group will only be able to send one member to the conference.

Ian Bautista, a sophomore in pre-law and a member of the Hispanic American Leaders Organization, said the Hispanics of Today conference is scheduled for Feb. 23-24 and further information concerning the conference can be obtained from the Minority Affairs office in Holton Hall.

HALO is also sponsoring a concert on Feb. 12-14, he said. There will be an information table in the K-

State Union Feb. 8, 11 and 12. Tickets can be purchased at these times or on the night of the concert.

MSC has recently submitted a tentative budget to SGA for the 1991-92 school year.

Along with the national conference in Kansas City, MSC is planning a similar conference at K-State. Kamenar said. An organizational meeting is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Feb. 13 in the SGA office.

Union drawing exhibit filled with color, form, creativity

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

The National Invitational Drawing Exhibition is limited only by size, but it's very easy to remember the art a lot bigger than it actually is. This exhibit is a credit to the quality of most of the works we have been able to see this year at the Union Art Gallery.

The exhibit is equally supplied with works concentrating on color, form and theme. The quality, innovation, design and creativity of nearly every piece is really exciting. The entire exhibit is full of intrigue, passion and inspiration.

The drawings range in media from pencil and charcoal, to ink and ballpoint. The themes and modes of expression vary just as greatly. Nature, technology and people are all equally represented.

The most provocative image presented a color picture of the blast of an atomic bomb. The familiar mushroom cloud rose in the center of the work with color charts bordering it. The work titled "Red, Yellow, Blue," also depicted the face of a Japanese woman peering up from the bottom of the scene.

Reviewer says ...

Great show!

Two nudes show interesting perspectives, one of which effectively places a male and a female body gradually receding from the man's fist. The other nude is a compilation of women's bodies in odd positions. The poses are intriguing.

The exhibit also offers some more experimental art. One such work is an ink drawing of several cows in a field of glitter. Another work is a collage of cut-out pictures of birds, feathers and sheep, titled "Folklore." One experimental piece told a short story to account for its surrealism, a giant pimento olive resting on the roof of a house.

Distance plays a big part in the perception of a piece depicting what appear to be mason jars on a shelf. The subtle blue-grey and black-grey shades seem almost to be colors because the dimensions of the picture are so realistic. The light reflecting off metal and glass is astonishing.

Light is important in several of the pieces, including a small picture of a wall with pipes and a block of sun shining on it. The tranquility of the scene is overwhelming.

The same sun is seen on a horizontal piece of a plain's horizon. It could be Kansas. The sky takes over a land strewn with bundled hay.

Additional works from the exhibit are on display in Gallery 6 of the Art Building.

Salons begin recycling

Customers now able to return used bottles

LORIE BYSEL
Collegian Reporter

As environmental safety becomes an increasing concern, some Manhattan hair salons are doing their part to recycle.

When a customer comes into a salon and purchases either a Red-kin or KMS product at regular price, they can bring the bottle back and have it refilled at a discount price, said Chas Crum, president of Crum's Beauty College.

This is done so people don't keep throwing the plastic bottles away, but re-using them, Crum said.

"This not only puts money in the customer's pocketbook, but it saves the environment," he said. "The customer must originally buy the product from us."

People can take an empty container to Crum's Beauty College, Crimper's Hair Design Studio or Lords 'N Ladies Hair Design and Skin Care Studio, said Cheryl Sjo-dahl, manager of Crimper's Hair Design Studio.

"I spear-headed it in the state of Kansas," Crum said. "You just hear about this stuff. I thought this would be neat to do in our salons and schools."

The two salons and the school are the only ones involved with this program for the time being because Crum is the owner and originator of the program. Crum said the program was approved by the State Board of Health and the State Board of Cosmetology.

Most all pump bottles can be refilled. Only squeeze tubes and a few pumps that can't really be opened aren't used, he said.

"We get five- to 10-gallon jugs with pumps of the product so that the product is never touched by the human hand," he said.

Crum also said he is checking to see if the salons can return the large gallon jugs to the manufacturer to be recycled.

"Just another step in saving the environment," he said.

Other local businesses are also involved in recycling.

Dillons is paying customers five cents if they bring in their used paper bags or canvas bags to sack their groceries, said Pete Peterson, manager of Westloop Dillons.

They also have a dropoff for plastic bags, but the customer doesn't receive any money for them, Peterson said.

"We also pick up plastic two-liter bottles and plastic milk cartons and take them to Wichita for recycling."

Transit system may be funded

SEAN MORAN
Collegian Reporter

The city of Manhattan is looking at the possible installation of a public transportation system with the help of federal funds and a gasoline sales tax.

Within the last month, the Urban Mass Transportation Agency has found funds available for the system, and Riley County has applied for a planning grant, said Edith Stunkel, associate director of the Center for Aging in Fairchild Hall.

Stunkel, candidate for city commission, said up to 10 percent of local gasoline sales taxes could be allocated for public transit.

The primary election is Feb. 26 and Stunkel, chairwoman of Manhattan's Social Services Advisory Board, said she doesn't plan to lobby for the system in her campaign.

"It's very important, but I will not push it," Stunkel said. "It has some opportunities, and I think it will improve."

Manhattan Mayor Richard Hayter said he also thinks there is a need for a public transportation system, but costs to install and maintain the system have been too great in the past.

"Every community needs public transportation," he said. "But you have to consider the cost of public transportation with the costs of other things in the community."

Manhattan has experimented with bus services in the past but has had little success. Hayter said Manhattan last had a bus service in the early 1970s. It was discontinued because of a lack of use.

Willie

"I've even done grocery shopping with it on," Willie recalled. "I've also driven around town with it, and I've only been pulled over once — that was in Lawrence."

While his originality is one of Willie's trademarks, he admits he has gotten ideas for gags and cheers from the fans.

A perfect example of this is the "Go" sign that he uses during timeouts. The routine ends when he turns the sign upside down and the crowd yells "Og."

"I was walking off the floor once," Willie said, "holding the sign upside down and I heard this group yell 'Og.' I thought it was hilarious so I decided to go ahead and use it. I think it works pretty good."

Willie doesn't just make appearances at ballgames. He makes public appearances throughout Kansas for various different events.

"If I can help out anybody, like raising money for charity, I'll do it," Willie said.

But, while being Willie can be very trying and time consuming, he said, it can also be satisfying and rewarding.

"Knowing that everyone is watching you and having that kind of control is really cool," Willie said. "It's such a natural high — the kind you get from skiing."

Being Willie isn't all fun and roses though, he said. Being heckled or tackled by opposing fans and the extensive amount of time required for the job are two disadvantages.

"It does take away from study and leisure time," Willie said. "I actually like doing the events, but I don't really like the road time."

But Willie said he can deal with the disadvantages because this will be his last semester as mascot, and he knows that it will all be over soon.

"Right now it's hard for me to imagine not doing it because I've been (doing it) three years," Willie said. "I set my schedule around being Willie, and it's going to be a real hole in my life knowing that I can't do it anymore."

"A lot of people tell me I do a good job, and I'm going to miss that, but in two years people will forget about me because there will be a new one," Willie said.

back on the map as a basketball force. However, his system was geared for success by controlling the game and making the often more-talented opponents uncomfortable. He turned the ball-controlled upset into an art.

However, Kruger struggled at recruiting top athletes into his system and K-State stopped improving, only holding its ground after the graduation of Mitch Richmond.

Sure, Kruger tried every year to up the tempo, but each year, he grew uncomfortable with the change and reverted back to the slower pace. K-State was no longer moving forward or improving its position, and a pair of first-round NCAA losses had left a bitter taste in Manhattan.

Kruger elevated the 'Cats from a depression and up to a level that brought pride to the program, but he was unable to continue to raise the level beyond competitiveness. If that's what Florida wants, its all theirs. As for K-State, even brighter things lie ahead.

The coaching change was the best thing that could have happened here.

Times now would be much worse if it hadn't taken place. Altman, unlike Kruger, will not guide us to continual mediocrity.

Instead, he will take the 'Cats from the level Kruger brought us to and carry us above with his new style of up-tempo ball. Athletes will no longer be reluctant to come to K-State because of a controlled game that in the past kept K-State's players from exerting maximum ability on the court.

The coaching staff will deploy this effective offense to bring in top athletes, and the success the program finds will build upon itself. The move should allow K-State to field teams that can play the nation's best teams and beat them with their talent rather than by frustrating them with an off-beat style of play.

Altman and his staff are preparing to take the program to a level its never seen, and it's time for 'Cat fans to jump onto the bandwagon and throw support rather than criticism toward the program. The faster style will also provide a new excitement that the Wildcats haven't shown in the past but have also yearned to watch.

special recognition. It is something we should all be involved in," he said. Stewart was also one of the initiators of the Manhattan Education Fairs in the mid-1980s. The fairs invited various sources in the community to set up booths for people to visit. Stewart said the fair was to introduce and make the community aware of the wealth of information available to them.

Anne Butler, director for educational supportive services, has worked with Stewart on many occasions and said he will be missed.

"Replacing him will not be an easy challenge because of his ability to reach out and connect with diverse elements," she said.

The Rev. Susan Sawyer is currently acting as Stewart's replacement.

spokesman for Save Rural Kansas, another of the groups in the coalition, said several members are veterans who support the war and the troops.

"We have stated from the very first that we are not a bunch of anti-war activists," Baccus said. "We support President Bush and what he is doing in the gulf."

"We just feel that the government has enough land," he said.

The coalition is monitoring developments in the proposed expansion in Congress and at the Pentagon. The opposition is being made behind closed doors, Baccus said.

"When this crisis started, our comment was that people needed to be praying for our people in gulf and for our leaders, that they might find a peaceful solution to this crisis," he said.

While the war continues, people should rally behind the troops, Baccus said. When the war ends, the coalition will be prepared to fight the military over the expansion.

Baccus, who is a farmer near Minneapolis, Kan., said he lives on the land his great-grandfather homesteaded after traveling to Kansas in a covered wagon.

"Walking through four country cemeteries you can trace my ancestry back a hundred years," Lewis said. "When you can do that it's very meaningful."

Rally cancelled due to disinterest

KIMIS HATJITIMO THEADIS
Contributing Writer

A Saturday rally that was to occur at the Statehouse in Topeka to protest lack of legislative funding for K-State was cancelled due to lack of participation.

Christopher Ralph, senior in political science and PRIMO vice president, one of the sponsor groups of the rally, said he is disappointed with K-State students.

He said apathy among students was probably the main reason not many students went to the rally.

"Students also don't believe anymore that their voice will change anything," Ralph said. He said the sponsor groups did their best to advertise the rally.

"The word was out," Ralph said. "They knew about it."

Ralph said he is also disappointed with the Student Government Association.

"(SGA members) did not support us," he said. "Not one of them showed up, and even the student body president didn't go."

Paul Davidson, junior in arts and science and spokesman for Southwind, another sponsor group, said that only 15 people showed up.

He said he was disappointed with the student body, but he said he believes the main reason for the lack of support was because SGA did not support the rally at all.

Davidson said if SGA had supported the rally, it would have been a success.

"We met with student leaders and made enough effort to accommodate them," he said.

The two leaders seemed discouraged about participation and may not even attempt to organize a rally for next year's Legislature.

Ralph said he and his group are not going to waste their time organizing another rally about the enrollment adjustment in the future.

Davidson said his group may try to do something again next year.

Other sponsors and participants of the rally were Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment, Students for Educational Awareness and the Ecumenical Christian Ministry.

Parade supports troops in gulf

Communities meet in Concordia to demonstrate appreciation for U.S. soldiers' efforts overseas

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

The largest crowd ever to take part in a parade in Concordia turned out to support American military personnel in the Persian Gulf.

Just minutes before the parade in the north-central Kansas town, Carol Jean Garlow, parade co-ordinator, was busy running back and forth between the parade marchers. She was interrupted repeatedly by people interested in becoming part of the parade.

"Total panic," Garlow said. "The streets will be lined with people, this is already a big success."

People came from Blue Rapids, Emporia, Manhattan, Salina and other communities to participate in the parade. The parade marchers were lined up on Sixth street in downtown Concordia, and the lines were stretched out for at least six blocks.

When the parade began, the downtown blocks were full of marchers and spectators. People were still flocking in to watch the parade as it concluded.

Spectators were carrying flags, banners and signs. Yellow ribbons lined the downtown area on Sixth Street. The marchers walked in small and large groups and were also rode tractors and trailers, school buses, motorcycles, horses and many new and antique vehicles.

Mike and Odella Yaksich, parade marchers and Concordia residents, were sitting on a large float with about 10 other people. Odella Yaksich was holding a sign that said "God Bless the Troops in Operation Desert Storm." They said their son was in the air force and was based in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. Both were adamant about their support for the troops.

"We have to be behind them," Mike Yaksich said. "We must support our boys."

Many of the parade marchers were area business people from Concordia and the surrounding communities. However, many American Legion posts, Veteran Foreign War chapters, Masons, Disabled American Veterans chapters and other organized groups participated.

Down the street two blocks, watching the crowd and parade, was James Wilson, commander of the American Legion Post 227 in Clifton, with six other members. They had just completed marching through downtown Concordia and were watching the rest of the parade. He said he and the other members of the troop were pleased with the turnout.

Homer Naumann, American Legion Post 227 member, said he was appreciative of the support given to the troops in Saudi Arabia.

"I feel real good. I am glad to see something like this," Naumann said. "They brought (supporters) out of the bushes. I see a lot of flags and ribbons. I feel real good."

A little girl in the crowd was carrying a sign that read "Come Home Safe — Come Home Soon." Close by children were racing

Preparations for ground phase of war continue

By the Associated Press

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia — As allied pilots bombed Iraqi troops and their supply lines Sunday, a senior American military official said the U.S.-led forces could use another three to four weeks to prepare for a ground offensive.

Defense Secretary Dick Cheney, meanwhile, said the next phase of the Persian Gulf War would probably combine air power with both ground and amphibious combat. But he would not say how soon it might begin.

See related story/Page 3

In Iraq, President Saddam Hussein made his first nationwide broadcast to his people since three days after the war began.

Speaking on Baghdad radio, he congratulated them for withstanding the attacks by the allied warplanes of shame. He told them their valor was inspiring the hundreds of thousands of Iraqi soldiers at the front.

In the air campaign, the Americans lost their first warplane in combat in more than a week. The Marine Corp AV-8 Harrier was downed over southern Kuwait on Saturday, and the pilot was missing, the U.S. command said.

Taking advantage of improving weather, American warplanes flew 2,800 missions Sunday, concentrating on Republican Guard troops on the Iraqi-Kuwaiti border and the bridges, highways and railways used to supply them.

The fierce action in the air, and sporadic exchanges of artillery along the Saudi border, came as Cheney headed back to Washington to brief President Bush on the progress.

He told reporters flying home with him that the air campaign had reduced the fighting power of some Iraqi divisions by as much as 40 percent.

Although Cheney did not say when a ground and amphibious assault might begin, a senior American military official said some U.S. forces just arrived in Saudi Arabia and they need three or four more weeks to prepare.

"The guys just off the boat, they could use some more time," the official told the Associated Press in Riyadh on condition of anonymity. He was referring to the ground units recently arrived from Europe. Such forces have the specialized M-1 battle tanks designed to take on Iraq's Soviet-made T-72 tanks.

Iraq said it would welcome a ground assault by the allies, who now have about 700,000 soldiers in the region, including 505,000 Americans.

Committee proposes raise in tuition

Board of Regents' report shows fees at Kansas schools lower than peer institutions

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Students may have to dig a little deeper for tuition if a proposal by a Board of Regents subcommittee is approved at the next regent's meeting.

The Committee on Tuition and Fees has recommended tuition be increased 10 percent for resident students at K-State, the University of Kansas and Wichita State beginning fall 1992. The proposal also increases tuition 8 percent for Emporia State, Fort Hays State and Pittsburg State, and increases out-of-state tuition 12.5 percent. For fiscal year 1993, the proposed increases would generate an additional $13.05 million for the regent system.

The proposed increases will be given a first reading at the regents' monthly meeting this Thursday in Topeka.

The committee's report stated a tuition increase of this magnitude is recommended in recognition that both resident and non-resident tuition rates are significantly below those charged by comparable institutions.

Though these increases are only proposals, K-State President Jon

Proposed Regent tuition increase

GREGORY A. BRANSON/Collegian

Wefald said he thought they had a reasonable chance of being implemented.

"I would think it's going to pass," Wefald said. "The tuition rate for fall 1991 is only going to increase 3 percent, which is much less than the inflation rate."

Wefald, tuition committee member, said the efforts to get Kansas schools on par with peer institutions, which for K-State includes Oklahoma State, Iowa State, Oregon State, Colorado State and North Carolina State, will require an increase in the students' share of education costs.

Another committee member, Mike Schreiner, KU student body president, said the establishment of a correlation between the Kansas schools and their peer institutions is needed to demonstrate to the Kansas Legislature that students are doing their best to pay for their schooling.

"I don't completely buy it," Schreiner said. "I guess the regents think if we go to the Legislature saying our tuition is comparable to our peer institutions, then they may be more willing to deal."

As unconvinced as he remained about the need for an increase, Schreiner said he was impressed with some of the financial aid plans the committee devised to offset the increase in tuition. The plans would grant aid to needy students based on their grade point average.

"I see those as positive things to offset the increases," Schreiner said. "And I think with the regents you have to take what you can get."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Police pose as reporters

Detectives go undercover to see deserter's speech

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Police posed as reporters and apparently took crowd photographs when an Army Reserve doctor surrendered publicly after leaving her unit to protest war in the Persian Gulf.

Police officials say two undercover detectives attended the news conference called Feb. 2 by Dr. Yolanda Huet-Vaughn, after which she surrendered to military authorities.

The officers carried fake press credentials, a camera and note pad, the Kansas City Star reported Saturday.

Sgt. Gary Jenkins said he sent the detectives to the rally under the guise of reporters to protect the doctor.

"We felt there was a potential threat to this Dr. Huet-Vaughn," Jenkins said. "There was so much national attention (surrounding her) we didn't want an embarrassing incident for Kansas City."

Deputy Chief Bob Wesley said the officers had done nothing wrong.

"It's pretty common," Wesley said. "We've done it before." He said the officers had not been impersonating reporters, only trying to be inconspicuous.

"They did have a press pass, but they weren't interviewing anyone or talking to anyone from a press perspective," Wesley said.

South Africa coup attempt fails

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Four military officers who tried to seize power in the Ciskei homeland were captured after a gunfight and placed under arrest, according to the Ciskei leader.

Brig. Gen. Oupo Gqozo made the announcement Saturday night after Ciskei leaders reported the second coup attempt in two weeks. The latest assault was led by the chief of Ciskei's defense force, Brig. Andrew Jamangile. Gqozo said in a statement read on television and radio.

He said Jamangile was under guard at a hospital, along with the other three alleged co-plotters. Ten co-conspirators, "plus or minus," were being sought, Gqozo said.

Ciskei is one of four black homelands considered independent by the South African government but not recognized as such by any other nation. About 1 million people live in the homeland, which covers 3,600 square miles on the Indian Ocean coast.

2nd opposition paper hits Albania

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — Communist Albania's second opposition paper appeared on newstands Sunday and sold out almost immediately, residents in the capital of Tirana said.

Meanwhile, students at Tirana University remained on strike for a fifth day, demanding the resignation of government leaders such as the Interior, Foreign and Justice Ministers.

The 50,000 copies of the four-page first issue of Republika, the newspaper of the Republican Party, sold out quickly for the 10 cent cover price, according to one purchaser contacted by telephone.

It devoted its front page to an article on Fan Noli, a leader of Albania's brief flirtation with democracy between the world wars, and gave extensive coverage to the student strike.

War does not stop Mardi Gras

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — The bawdy, boozy party called Mardi Gras hits the streets this week only slightly tempered by war and recession.

Hotels around New Orleans reported bookings of 91 percent, down from 97 percent occupancy last year, for the final four days of Carnival, which ends with the big Mardi Gras bash Tuesday. Carnival formally begins Jan. 6.

The Persian Gulf War initially looked as if it would really hurt Mardi Gras, said University of New Orleans economist James McLain.

Mardi Gras, French for Fat Tuesday, ends midnight Tuesday, when Ash Wednesday ushers in six weeks of Lenten repentance to this predominantly Roman Catholic city.

Legislators in Arizona accused

PHOENIX (AP) — Arizona's political arena, tarnished by the governor's impeachment in 1988 and ethics complaints against its U.S. senators, is reeling from a sting that netted indictments against seven state legislators.

The yearlong undercover operation emerged last week just as the Statehouse was considering cuts in law enforcement funds and changes in prison sentencing laws. Defense lawyers claim the timing is more than coincidental.

"How do you launder this much?" the Senate majority whip, Democrat Carolyn Walker, asks as she accepts $15,000 in cash, in a scene prosecutors captured on videotape.

The seven lawmakers, a justice of the peace, a former state Democratic Party executive director, a former jail guard, and five others who are either lobbyists or activists were indicted on charges of conspiracy to bribe and launder money.

The indictment accuses the legislators of accepting more than $100,000 in cash from an informant posing as a flamboyant gaming consultant trying to legalize casino gambling in Arizona.

Chemical company to end dumping

WICHITA (AP) — Vulcan Chemicals Co. dumped about half the toxic chemicals and acids that made Kansas the 13th ranked state in the country for waste dumping, 1989 state records say.

The company says it will stop all hazardous chemical dumping within the next five years.

Its sprawling plant south of Wichita dumped 91 million pounds of toxins and acids in 1989 into an underground layer of limestone.

Only 12 states report more toxic chemicals released to the air, waterways and land than Kansas. All 12 have larger populations and more industry than Kansas.

Vulcan has used deep wells for three decades to dispose of hazardous wastes. For most companies, injecting hazardous wastes would be illegal.

Cops receive Camaros for patrol

COLBY (AP) — Look out, Thomas County, the sheriff has some rubber-peeling new wheels: 16-inch mag-style.

"It's sure improved communications with the kids," said Capt. Mike Baugh, whose patrol car is one of the department's two new Chevy Camaros.

Sheriff Tom Jones drives the other low-slung, metallic-blue Camaro with big gold shields affixed to the long doors. The engine is driven by 350-cubic-inch V-8 gurgling through dual exhausts.

Jones was asked if he was living out some unfulfilled hot-car fantasy from his younger days?

"No," he said with a laugh. "I had a Corvette when I was in my early 20s. But I didn't like the insurance premiums and the 8 to 9 miles a gallon mileage. I only had it a short span of time. I traded it off for a VW Bug."

Jones said the Camaros were cheaper and more practical than standard patrol cars.

Professor says war for sake of economy

ERWIN SEBA
Staff Reporter

The United States is seeking to gain leverage over Japan and Germany in the Persian Gulf War, said Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics.

Rahman took part of a panel discussion Saturday at the Douglass Community Center sponsored by the Manhattan Coalition for Peace in the Middle East.

Because of economic decline, the United States is a superpower only by virtue of its military strength, Rahman said. If it gains a hegemony over the Middle Eastern oil fields following the war, it will be able to compensate for its inability to compete economically with Japan and Germany.

"Control of oil is very primary to the U.S.," she said. "It gives the U.S. leverage over Japan and Germany when it can't compete with them. So it can say, 'Hey, come on, you've got to deal with us.'"

For this reason, the United States did not negotiate with Saddam Hussein prior to the war's start when Saddam was willing to negotiate, Rahman said.

"Some other interests became more important," she said concerning the United States' refusal to end the Iraqi occupation of Kuwait through diplomacy.

The forum, titled "The War in the Gulf: A Panel Discussion," also included remarks by Anne Butler, assistant dean and director for educational support services, about the use of American minority soldiers in an expected ground war.

Since the Civil War, when slaves were recruited for combat, minorities have fought with the expectation that it would earn them the rights and opportunities of the majority population. In this expectation, minorities have always been disappointed, Butler said.

Discrimination has also affected the missions minority troops were assigned in combat. She said the same will be true for the ground war against Iraq.

"Large numbers of black men and men of color will be used as they were in Vietnam, as decoys to flush out the enemy," Butler said.

Increasing militarization of the U.S. economy is also harming minorities, she said. As more and more money is devoted to military spending, less assistance is provided to education and the needy.

"(Minorities) are on death row in increasing numbers, increasingly the victims of the horrendous rise in drug-related crime," Butler said. "Rights to education have deteriorated. Access to health care is almost non-existent. A nation that continues to spend more money on defense than education, I feel, as Martin Luther King surely felt, such a nation is approaching spiritual death."

Charles Perkins, emeritus professor of psychology and a World War II conscientious objector, said non-violent methods were more effective to achieving peace instead of waging war.

In the past few years, non-violent revolutions have overthrown dictatorships in the Philippines and Eastern Europe, Perkins said.

"It seems to me if we really want a kinder, gentler nation and world, it seems to me we're not going to get it by war," he said. "We're going to get it by the means used by Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King."

Perkins said he did not think President Bush should be described as evil. Rather that Bush was trying to achieve what he believes to be a good aim — the end of Kuwait's occupation — by the wrong method. And that Bush has not reflected on his motives for engaging in war.

"The whole business of motives is quite trying," Perkins said. "I think he thinks he is doing the right thing and he's been too busy getting ahead to ask himself those questions."

About 30 people attended the forum. Another forum has been scheduled for 3 p.m., Saturday at the Manhattan Public Library, Poyntz and Juliette Avenues.

Animals housed during war

Shelter Alert provides temporary homes for Fort Riley pets

LORIE BYSEL
Collegian Reporter

Those furry little bodies who no longer have the attention and love of their masters because they've been deployed to the Middle East are now being adopted by loving families around the state.

Fort Riley has set up a desk for people willing to adopt a pet for awhile and those soldiers who need to find a home for theirs, said Captain Steeck, chief of animal medicine branch of veterinary services at Fort Riley.

"We act as an agent to bring them all together; we don't usually see the animals," Steeck said. "The owners and the adopters make arrangements to pick up the animals."

Most of the animals adopted through this program have been dogs, she said.

"We've had people come all the way from Wichita to foster pets," she said. "We really appreciate all the people offering to adopt these pets."

These people take care of the soldiers' pets until they return home and can care for them again.

"We haven't seen a lot of animals being brought in, maybe eight or 10 a month," said Roxie Whitehead, of the Topeka Humane Society. "We keep them up to two weeks and try to adopt them out," she said.

"After the first deployment we didn't have that many animals come in, but we have had more recently," said Verna Pointer, of the Riley County Animal Shelter.

Joyce May, of the Humane Society of the United States — Companion Animals Department, said they have started a Shelter Alert program. They have sent out bulletins all across the country to animal shelters making them aware of the program.

"We find prompt foster care for animals or make room for them in clinics and kennels," May said. "People have been donating food and money for veterinarian bills to families who can't afford these expenses because the bread-winner of the family has been deployed," she said.

Love it or leave it attitude not necessary

"Those of us who love our country could get along just fine without (Skoog) ... And please, take John Prine with you." --letter to the editor, Feb. 6, 1991.

"Kill the body and the head will die." --old boxing wisdom Skoog, Feb. 10, 1991.

A weird island off the coast of Guyana. Re: why my column will be late, and the strange circumstance in which I have found myself.

Dear Steve (my desk editor),
I am sorry that my column didn't get to you in time to be printed. I typed it on the boat and was going to send it to you when we docked in Georgetown, Guyana, but events conspired against my well-laid plans, as they tend to do. It is still in the envelope on my cabin table, and with any luck, the cabin boy will have the good sense to mail it, if he finds it. They might not be aware that we are gone yet.

It is an excellent column, I feel. Mr. Prine helped with spellings and the finer points of grammar. The captain contributed a couple of sentences. It's about all the good things that are happening in the world. I hope it will get to you sometime. You'll have to excuse the waterstains on the paper, but you understand.

I imagine that you are curious where we are. As good as Mr. Prine can guess, we are somewhere off the coast of Guyana, our origi-inal destination.

After the spew of "Love it or leave it" letters addressed to me after my last column, I decided to take their advice and head south with Mr. John Prine, as per the aforementioned advice. In hindsight I see that perhaps it was not a good idea, but it seemed like a good idea at the time.

I suggested that we visit Sweden, my ancestral homeland, but Mr. Prine said that it was too cold there, and I agreed. He said that Guyana always seemed like a fascinating place for America-haters such as ourselves to go, and it was agreed. I have great respect for my companion. I feel bad that I led us here, to this island which the strange natives call, in their language of sound bites, Wusherton: Distrip of Fulumbia, or Fulumbia, for short.

Steve, I will spare you the embarrassing details of how we got here. I will say that the weather just south of Cuba is peculiar and that Fidel Castro is a nice guy, just a little misunderstood.

We washed up on shore with our string of beer bottles, which we used for flotation, air, and refreshments. It was morning, and the Caribbean sun was slowly roasting Mr. Prine and me. I stood up and looked around. The beach was about a hundred feet long and composed of fine white sand. The jungle beyond was very dense, and I could only see about ten feet into the darkness. We decided to forage for food, but then remembered that we had the forethought to stuff a bunch of Oh-Henry! bars and Pringle's into the knapsack. The Pringle's were soaked through and pasty, but tasted pretty good nonetheless.

Of course, Steve, I explained to Mr. Prine that I was under 21, and therefore it was illegal to drink the beer that we saved, but he reminded me that when we left America, we gave up such protection, and that it was one of the sacrifices we had to make. I sorrowfully agreed and drank one of the longnecks. What could I do? It was an import, but I stuck it out and reflected that one of the best things about America is that they are considerate enough to protect the people from such dangerous practices.

You are lucky. I looked ahead and saw a sad lifetime of not wearing hard hats in construction areas and doing whatever I pleased. It was a tender moment. I almost cried when Mr. Prine said that I would never be able to pay sales taxes or get to apply for a fishing license again.

It was then that I saw the crowd. They were at the far end of the beach, and power-walking right towards us! Mr. Prine said to hold my ground.

"They can smell fear," he said.

It was a gruesome bunch. Red ties. Blue blazers. Oh my god, I thought, they were going to kill us where we stood, but I pretended to be calm. One of them was wearing a three-piece pinstriped suit. They looked just like regular humans and were impeccably dressed! Steve, I don't readily admit to fear, but I can't relate how afraid I was then.

The one in the pinstripes came forward and made me shake his hand. His grip was powerful. He spoke, but it was hard to understand what he was saying.

"Hi, there," he said, in a voice that reminded me of a news anchor. "Prudence. Revenue-raising measure. Temporarily doable. Goal-minded." It was English, but a strange creole lingo that I couldn't quite catch. We could get their general ideas, and it seemed these disgusting creatures wanted us to follow them back to their city. What could we do?

The city was small, with straw huts arranged in a circle around a hub, which was slightly elevated. The one with the pinstriped suit led us to a mansion in the center of the hub, where an old man and a young man with a moustache were hitting each other in the head with big clubs.

It was weird, Steve. The old man was bashing the moustached man in the head, and the moustached man was beating the old man in the knees. The old man was winning, but his head fell off and rolled around on the floor. It was amazing. The loss of the head didn't seem to have much of an effect on the fight. The old, headless man kept fighting, and the young man found something new to hit.

The head was still rolling around, alternately laughing and telling his former body to "Cut it out," and "You're too funny, stop fighting." But the bodies kept at it, determined.

Eventually the headless body whacked the moustached man really hard and it fell down. The headless body jumped around in a hideous victory dance. The head kept telling the body to quit acting so high and mighty.

The body jerked around and looked at its head, then went over to a chalkboard and wrote in messy handwriting, "LOVE IT OR LEAVE IT!" Then the body ran past us, out of the room, and left us alone in the room with the severed head.

Well, to make a long story short, Steve, we have decided to stick around a little while longer. I hope you get this. Mail service around here is a little unreliable, they tell me, and if my column comes in before this, be sure to run it. It's much more interesting.

Support for our troops must last beyond today

College students, both those who support the need for military action in the gulf and those who oppose it, pledge to "Support the Troops."

In fact, today's college students, as the most privileged of their generation, will have plenty of opportunity in the future to demonstrate the sincerity of this vow to support the troops, who include in their number large amounts from disadvantaged minorities and classes.

Although it is hoped the pledge is sincere, it is being made in the pre-war emotional atmosphere- yet to be tested by the realities of war.

We need to support the troops even if in one or two years the war no longer seems as easy or conclusive as popular opinion may now believe it will be. If the war becomes unpopular, today's volunteer soldiers may be even more vulnerable to resentment than those in the conscript army of Vietnam.

Today's college students should remember to support the troops 10 to 15 years from now when, as the highest paying taxpayers in their age group, they are asked to fund programs to care for the physical health of veterans of the Persian Gulf War.

In the future, remember to support those troops who cannot seem to emotionally put the war behind them, long after the American public has gone on to other concerns.

Also, support the troops when veterans need tax-supported programs to cope with unemployment and retraining for civilian jobs. Because, for all the talk of a hi-tech Army, many a field grunt must be learning few, if any, vocational skills they can take into their post-military lives.

Troops in the gulf may soon be asked to fight what promises to be a nasty, bloody war. If that is the case, they will need our support more in the future, not as a morale booster, but for re-adjustment to civilian lives.

Action speaks loudly

Editor,

I thought I would relay to you a good samaritan act which was done for me today. A K-State civil engineering student, Doug Bjornstad, found the wallet I had lost. He went to a lot of trouble to find me, and he also didn't take my money.

I found this to be very touching to find that people are honest and caring. I hope you print a story about this fact, and that everyone will read it. It is a blessing to have such people around.

Center needs checks

Editor,

It was really nice to finally see an article in the Collegian about the KSU Child Development Center (CDC). The CDC is an extremely vital part of our community not only because it serves the student, faculty and staff of the University, but also because it is a factor in the increasing student enrollment at K-State. Moreover, the children of our community whom our nation's future depends upon, have benefited greatly from the services provided by the center.

However, there is no well-defined mechanism for the control of the CDC's affairs. The CDC has a peculiar position in that the top management is administratively controlled by K-State's Housing Department, but housing maintains a hands-off policy whenever any major issues originate. The administration of the CDC, according to the Constitution of the KSU Child Development Center, is supposed to receive advice from a KSU CDC Board of Directors. Yet the control mechanism on CDC administration is so loose, that it is almost nonexistent. And this central issue is creating many problems in the CDC which have been epitomized in the board meeting held on Jan. 30.

We all live in a country whose federal and state governments are based on a system of checks and balances. This efficient system must be brought down even to the local level. Unfortunately, there is no system of checks and balances for the KSU CDC. It is this fundamental problem of organization that is of grave concern to many parents whose children attend the center, the employees of the center and even the Manhattan community as a whole.

The article printed Jan. 31 regarding the CDC seems to be questioning the loyalty of student-parents to the organization. However, it is important to note that the question of loyalty has arisen because the students feel strongly that they aren't being served well. Indeed, when there is no control over an organization, problems tend to appear.

Many of these problems were highlighted in the board meeting Jan. 30. For example, the present administration of the KSU CDC has been making certain management decisions without any communication with the Board of Directors. This not only clearly violates Article VI, section A of the CDC Constitution, which states that the Board "shall advise the executive director on all matters," but it also is exemplary of the fact that there is no real system of checks and balances.

Because of the growing sentiment of concern for the future of the KSU CDC, a complete review of the administration of the center and the activities of the CDC must be considered. Once again, I can not stress enough the importance of the role the KSU CDC plays in this community, and no one should allow the deterioration of this vital service to the university community and the Manhattan community in general.

Where's the beef?

Editor,

I currently live in Haymaker Hall. This means that every month I pay $320 just like several thousands others. In the course of this school year I have noticed the food serving portions seem to be smaller, while the lines are getting longer. I realize there will always be lines, but the food should be enough to fill people up. There was a notice on my floor's peg board from the Derby Food Center that said potatoes and vegetables are unlimited. I thought this meant I could have as many french fries as I want. This isn't so. When I asked for more fries, I was told no.

The K-State athletes not only have their own food line in Derby, but it has come to my attention that they can eat as much as they like, provided they are not on a diet. Why are they thought of as better than the rest of us students? Some of the athletes don't even live in the dorm while still eating in Derby. Where is my $320 going each month? If I am paying for the athletes to eat as much as they want while I get small portions, I want it stopped. There is nothing wrong with athletics or athletes, it's the policy that's wrong. All a person has to do is walk by the dorms to see how many people live here. There are quite a few dollars going to K-State housing. How much is going to Derby to pay for the athletes' food?

Everyone should get as much of the side dishes as they like regardless of their class ranking or athletic involvement. The policy of giving athletes all the food while starving the rest of us is wrong. I want more fries.

Sarcasm undetected

Editor,

It seems my telephone interview with your reporter didn't turn out so good. Perhaps it was because the interviewer couldn't see my sarcastic expressions. My point about mobile classrooms was that they were better than nothing and could be put up quite quickly in a needed situation. My other point was one of skepticism of the local board to use local talent, and they place all credence in an expensive, so-called "expert study." When in reality, our local school district is blessed with the expertise of K-State. We should look no further for advice, student teachers and proxies. This also makes sense to the University to apply learned skills locally.

My platform is simple. I would like to see the most classes in a local school setting in order to give one a sense of home, street and community. Students and parents should get involved in the local niche, because it is the foundation of belonging to the bigger program of Manhattan and the rest of the world.

Our town has grown to the point of separate districts. The reason I am running for the local school district is to tell the present board that we are tired of being put on a guilt trip that because we don't want to mortgage our kids' future we are anti-children. If we build another mono-grade facility, we will end up soon with all one-grade schools. That isn't what life is like. Our kids need more diversification and desegregation. If we follow present board policies, we end up in deep debt, with a large bus pollution problem and, most of all, not belonging to anything.

Group encourages mutual understanding

Manhattan Friendship Cities Project continues ties with Nindiri, Nicaragua

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan Friendship Cities Project Inc., tries to involve the people of Manhattan in the lives of people abroad.

According to the by-laws of the organization, the purpose is to "promote mutual understandings and support between the people of Manhattan and communities of other countries, through general education, citizen exchange and material assistance to these communities."

The group was instrumental in the adoption of Nindiri, Nicaragua as a sister city to Manhattan on Dec. 9, 1986. Since then, many people from Manhattan have gone to Nindiri to provide aid and cultural exchanges.

Anne Cowan, member of the group, went there as a physical therapist and has been the organization's contact for the past year.

She said it is hard to get things done because communication is slow, but once things get started the people are very gracious.

Gloria Freeland, associate director of Student Publications Inc. and project president, said the group is currently working on the construction of a community library, cultural gallery and recreation center. So far, they have sent $1,500 to help in the construction.

"Our goal is $10,000 by July 1," she said. "We raise our money by selling crafts made by the people of Nindiri, by selling Nicaraguan coffee and by donations. We aren't giving charity because we are selling their things."

With the $1,500 from Manhattan, they have already poured a concrete slab, Cowan said. Residents have used it for boxing matches, dances and it also serves as a hangout for town teenagers.

Nindiri was chosen as a sister city because of its similarities to Manhattan. The people of Nindiri are involved in agriculture, art and small industry, she said.

Most of the people involved in the program have either lived in Latin America or are involved in international affairs, Freeland said.

The people are friendly, open and gracious, she said.

"Eventually we'd like to have people from Nicaragua come to Manhattan," she said. "But right now I'd like to see more involvement from the people of Manhattan."

SPORTS MONDAY

Cyclones destroy Wildcats

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

The only thing the Iowa State Cyclones weren't able to do in their drubbing of K-State on Saturday was become the first visiting team to ever crack the 100-point barrier in Manhattan.

Many disappointed fans headed for the exits with several minutes to play, but those who stayed saw the Cyclones, who racked up 55 second-half points, extend the score to 98-70 with 2:15 left to play.

Earlier in the second half, the Cyclones connected on 13 consecutive attempts from the field. They shot 68 percent from the field in the second period, and when the Wildcats desperately attempted to apply full court pressure on the ISU guards, the Cyclones ripped through it repeatedly for layups.

Two points in just more than two minutes? The way things were rolling for the Cyclones, it looked as if the only thing that could keep them from reaching the century mark was if the roof of Bramlage Coliseum were to cave in.

After several missed opportunities and four unanswered Wildcat scores, the Cyclones were stalled on 98 and time ran out without allowing them a shot at history.

Aware of the significance of the final moments or not, the 'Cats found no reason for consolation following what Altman called the team's worst effort of the season. "Without a doubt it was the worst we've looked," Altman said. "It was a very lackluster performance that I know we're very disappointed by."

Following a one-game reprieve from their shooting woes, the Wildcats shot just 38 percent while they watched their red-hot guests roll over every defense they threw at them.

"I'm not sure why we were as flat as we were. I thought we were relatively ready to play," said Altman.

ISU 98, 'Cats 78

who said he didn't think the upset win over Oklahoma earlier in the week caused the letdown. "I've got to take some of the blame for us not being ready to play."

The Wildcats stayed close for the first 13 minutes of the contest behind the inspired defensive hustle of forward Keith Amerson. Starting the usual small lineup against the bigger ISU team, Altman issued the challenge of guarding all-Big Eight center Victor Alexander to Amerson, who gave up an advantage of five inches and 80 pounds to Alexander.

On their first trip down the floor, Amerson fronted the ISU center and intercepted the entry pass. Over the next five minutes, Amerson harassed Alexander into fumbling two possessions in the paint, missing his only attempt and forced two errant passes into the post.

With the 'Cats holding a 12-8 advantage, however, Amerson went to the bench for a rest at 13:25 left, and the floodgates were opened. The Cyclones moved to a slight lead, and Amerson returned to guard Alexander.

After Amerson scored from the perimeter to help shrink the ISU lead to 26-24 at 7:00 the Cats were held scoreless over the next two minutes, and the Cyclones ran to a nine-point advantage.

Lady Cats rally, down Iowa State in key Big 8 game

DAN WICKER
Sports Reporter

For a collegiate team to be successful, it has to be able to win important games away from its home court.

That is exactly what the K-State Lady Cats did Saturday afternoon in Ames, Iowa. K-State, which had dropped to second place in the Big Eight standings after losing to Oklahoma, remained in contention for the conference title with a 73-61 victory over Iowa State.

Lady Cats 73, ISU 61

"It was a great win because it was a road win and kept us in the thick of things in the conference," Lady Cat coach Susan

Yow said. "We were coming off a devastating loss to Oklahoma, and it was great to get back in the win column."

K-State had to overcome offensive problems in the first half and early in the second half before claiming the win. The team kept alive in the game with tough defense, committing just 10 personal fouls the entire contest.

"We had the defense, but couldn't get the offense going. We finally did get in going in the second half," Yow said. "It says a lot about the strength of the team to win on the road."

Mary Jo Miller and Diana Miller keyed the run down the stretch to put the Lady Cats on top for good. Diana Miller tied the ballgame after K-State had been down by 10, and Mary Jo Miller nailed two consecutive three-point bombs to boost K-State into the lead 56-54.

"I thought there were two keys. Diana Miller tied the ballgame, and it hadn't been tied since the start. Prior to that our defense kept us in the game," Yow said. "Then Mary Jo hit two three pointers. That really took us over the edge and gave us the motivation we had been missing."

Mary Jo Miller produced her best outing of the season and surpassed a record in the process. She scored a season-high 20 points on 6-of-10 shooting, including 3-of-4 behind the arc, and had nine assists to become the K-State all-time leader with 406.

Mary Jo Miller

"They were really concentrating on stopping Nadira (Hazim) and Diana, and left me open a couple of times and I was able to take the three-point shots," the junior point guard said. "It was a team effort. If it wasn't for them I would have never set this record. I give a lot of credit to them."

Iowa State owned the first half of play and gradually built a 38-31 margin heading into the lockerroom. K-State looked to be in the same trouble it had in that first half by starting out 0-of-7 from the field in the second 20 minutes. The Lady Cats then hit their next 5-of-6 to pull them within striking distance.

"Very few games are lost in the first 20 minutes. You talk about what you are doing wrong, then make adjustments and come out the second half," Yow said. "We told them that we believed in them, and they would be OK."

Only six K-State players saw action in the game, and Mary Jo Miller, Diana Miller and Hazim never had a rest. Hazim lead all scorers with 23 and Diana Miller added 17. Yow said, however, the contribution of the bench was instrumental in the win. "Those six that played contributed all they could. I thought Leah Honeycutt and Kristie Bahner did a good job on the boards, and we were able to hit our free throws down the stretch," Yow said.

The victory leaves K-State in a tie with Nebraska for second and one game behind leader Oklahoma State in the conference race. The Lady Cats moved their record to 14-7 overall and 7-3 in the Big Eight.

Guard tandem sparks ISU

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Reporter

Iowa State's Doug Collins remembered watching K-State's destruction of Oklahoma on television Tuesday night.

He didn't forget the butterflies in his stomach when he turned his set off, either. "It was shocking for me to see Kansas State beat them like that," Collins said. "But every team that plays at home in the Big Eight has the momentum going for them."

So how did Collins explain the Cyclones' 98-78 rout of the Wildcats in Bramlage Coliseum Saturday?

"I can't," Collins said. "I'm shocked. I still am. (K-State) is a good team, but I just feel we took it to them before they took it to us."

With some help from backcourt mate Justus Thigpen, Collins led a flawless second-half charge that gave Iowa State its largest margin of victory in a Big Eight road game in five years.

Collins scored 14 of his season-high 26 points after intermission, and Thigpen added 15 of his 17 as the Cyclones outscored K-State 55-46.

Thigpen joined Collins in the postgame search for answers to the blowout.

"It's hard to believe that we could just come in here and run them off like that," Thigpen said. "We're capable of doing that, but just knowing how the league's been going, it's kind of a shock."

Not as startling as it was for the 'Cats. K-State guard Jeff Wires, who covered Collins during part of the game, said his play helped the Cyclone guards look good.

"Anybody can score 30 points if they're shooting layups all day," Wires said.

Layups weren't all. Collins highlighted a half of Iowa State showtime on an alley-oop dunk from Thigpen that gave the Cyclones a 79-52 lead.

Jayhawks, not surprisingly, atop conference standings

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Despite all this talk about the emergence of Nebraska and Oklahoma State, that's a familiar bird atop the Big Eight standings.

It's a Jayhawk. It's been there before. And now, with a 79-69 victory over previous co-leader Oklahoma State, the No. 18 Kansas Jayhawks own sole possession of first place in the Big Eight race.

Still, Alonzo Jamison isn't ready to accept the trophy.

"We can't say that right now," said the Kansas forward, who had 11 points and six rebounds in the tie-breaking victory over Oklahoma State. "Everyone's playing good in the Big Eight."

Now unbeaten in 12 games at home this year, the Jayhawks stand 17-4 overall and 6-2 in the Big Eight. The Cowboys, who forced the Jayhawks into a nine-minute field goal drought in the second half, fell to 16-5, 5-3.

Nebraska survived a furious bid by Colorado Saturday to remain tied for second at 5-3. The No. 15 Cornhuskers emerged with a deceptively lopsided 86-72 victory to go to 19-4, 5-3. Colorado, still winless in regular season Big Eight road games since 1983, dropped to 12-9, 2-6.

For No. 23 Oklahoma, things just kept getting worse. Seton Hall ended a three-game losing streak by handing the Sooners (15-8, 4-4) an 82-75 loss in Norman, their fifth defeat in six games.

homa State because he missed the team bus, ignited a 24-8 run in the final 8:40 of the first half with the first of his two 3-pointers.

The Jayhawks led by as many as 22. But Oklahoma State got to within six points in the second half. Mark Randall led the Jayhawks with 25 points and Jordan had 19. Sean Sutton had 19 for Oklahoma State while Byron Houston was held to 13 points, 10 below his average.

"I don't think anyone in the conference thought we had much chance here today," said Oklahoma State coach Eddie Sutton.

Seton Hall 92, OU 75

At Oklahoma, Terry Dehere scored 21 points and led three other Seton Hall players in double figures as the Sooners suffered their fourth loss of the season at home, the most since 1980-81.

"We were never in control of the game," Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs said. "We chased all through the first half, and in the second half we were never in a controlling position. They dictated the way the game was going to be played."

The Pirates (14-7) outshot Oklahoma 61 percent to 45 percent, had a 35-26 rebound advantage and outscored the Sooners 37-18 from the free throw line.

Jeff Webster led Oklahoma with 26 points, but did not make a field goal in the final 11:43 after the Pirates switched to a man-to-man defense.

NU 86, CU 72

Nebraska got control of the stubborn Buffs with one of the strangest sights ever seen on a basketball court — a 7-footer drilling a 3-pointer. But with the score tied 45-45, 7-2 Rich King let fly with the first 3-pointer of his career.

"I got the ball out there and didn't know if I should do it. Coach (Danny) Nee all year has said that he has faith in the big men shooting from outside, so I wasn't afraid to shoot it," King said. "I just shot it and it felt good. I heard the crowd go 'NO!', I mean I literally heard it and then they cheered."

King's shot put Nebraska ahead midway through the second half and the Huskers unleashed a 27-9 spurt to put the game out of reach.

King was good up close, too, making 11 of 12 free throws, scoring 24 points and pulling in 14 rebounds. Shaun Vandiver led Colorado with 25 points, 21 in the second half, and Stevie Wise had 20.

"They wore us down in the second half," Colorado coach Joe Harrington said. "They came out and shot the ball well and they have a little better depth than we do."

UNLV downs Hogs

By the Associated Press

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. — There's a big difference between No. 1 and No. 2. And that's what has UNLV rolling toward the record books.

Everything that might have worked against the top-ranked Rebels was there. Playing No. 2 Arkansas. On the road. Even trailing at halftime for the first time all season. It didn't matter.

With Stacey Augmon leading the way with 31 points, the top-ranked Runnin' Rebels ran away to a 112-105 victory over the Razorbacks on Sunday for their 31st consecutive win.

In ending the Razorbacks' winning streak at 20 games, UNLV withstood the first-half pressure of a record crowd of 9,640 at Barnhill Arena and went on a 16-2 run to start the second half to take control of the game.

The Rebels (20-0) trailed 50-46 at the half before seizing control and taking a 62-52 lead with 16:19 left.

UNLV, trying to become the first undefeated team since Indiana in 1976 and the first repeat national champ since UCLA in 1973, had beaten 19 other opponents by an average of 32 points. Arkansas tried to keep pace, but Augmon, Anderson Hunt and Larry Johnson — who totaled 82 points — wouldn't let them.

Arkansas (23-2) closed to 66-61 with 14:27 to play before UNLV turned it on again, scoring nine straight points and forcing the Razorbacks to use the last of their timeouts with 12:45 left.

UNLV extended the lead to 98-75 with 6:23 left and a late rally by Arkansas wasn't nearly enough. The Rebels became the eighth top-ranked team to win a No. 1 vs. No. 2 matchup in 10 meetings over 10 years.

With 2:27 to play, Johnson and Todd Day of Arkansas were ejected for unsportsmanlike conduct when a brief scuffle broke out.

Hunt had 26 points and Johnson 25, including 19 in the second half. Day led the Razorbacks, whose only other loss was to Arizona, with 26 points and Oliver Miller had 22.

In taking its halftime lead, Arkansas got its final 12 points on 3-pointers, including Lee Mayberry's 45-second clock beater with 13 seconds left.

An 11-0 spurt gave the Razorbacks a 36-30 lead with 7:16 to play. UNLV went 3:04 without a field goal as Arkansas' pressure defense forced three turnovers in the run and Miller asserted himself inside with a block of Augmon and a length-of-the-court bullet pass to Day for an easy dunk which capped the run.

The loss also snapped Arkansas' 19-game home winning streak.

Several ranked teams played Saturday. Included among them were:

Syracuse 70,
Notre Dame 69

Billy Owens scored with six seconds left to lift No. 7 Syracuse (20-3). Owens finished with 31 points.

N. Carolina 77, Virginia 58

Hubert Davis scored 19 points, including 12 from 3-point range, leading No. 9 North Carolina (17-4) over No. 11 Virginia (17-6).

Utah 67,
San Diego St. 60

Josh Grant got 18 points and Walter Watts 15 to lead Utah (22-2). Grant also had 13 rebounds and Watts 9, including two offensive rebounds in the final half minute that helped secure the victory.

Georgetown 71, Villanova 62

Alonzo Mourning had 7 of his 19 points in overtime as No. 20 Georgetown (15-6) beat Villanova.

ISU's Bivens now known around league

David Svoboda

Sports Editor

Donnell who?

It was a simple question, really, that K-State coaches, players and fans were left asking themselves and others following Saturday's loss to Iowa State.

A guy — and a freshman, no less — who had scored just 13 points all year burned the 'Cats for 18 in the 20-point Cyclone win.

"Donnell who" was Donnell Bivens, a 6-5 native of Rantoul, Ill. Bivens' name was buried in the Iowa State basketball media notes issued before the game — it first appeared on page eight.

And it was only Bivens' play of late that kept him from being buried right along with his name.

"Here in the last two weeks, he's been getting better and better," Cyclone coach Johnny Orr said of one of the four Cyclones who scored in double figures.

Bivens, a soft-spoken sort who undoubtedly was doing his first college television interview while soaking wet and wrapped in nothing but a towel, agreed with the assessment of his coach.

"I've been practicing pretty good for about three weeks straight," he told those gathered in a group just outside a Bramlage Coliseum shower. "It was a good opportunity for me to show the coaches I could play."

And show them he surely did.

Bivens also had five rebounds in his 31 minutes of playing time, and was 7-of-8 from the floor and 4-of-5 from the line. All that from a guy who had a scoring average going into the contest of under 1 point per game.

Bivens was in the starting lineup against K-State because of his recent practice performances, an effort last week at Oklahoma State in which he had eight points and five boards and the 'Cats' smaller lineup.

"He's a good player, and he's been playing super of late," Orr said. "When they went to the little guys, we thought we'd give him a chance. He sure did a hell of a job."

Nice understatement, Johnny.

Bivens had a thunderous dunk in the midst of his 10-point second-half effort that was undoubtedly one of the most awesome displays of sheer athletic prowess ever witnessed in Bramlage.

This from a guy who had just one very unimpressive start previously as a college player.

That start came way back on Dec. 5, in a 19-point loss to Baylor.

"We gave him a chance at Baylor," Orr said, remembering one of the few times Bivens had seen the light of day this year prior to the blinding light that he gave off Saturday. "It was the ninth game in 12 days, and he didn't play well."

"After we came back home, he was shelved until he showed he could play."

His practice efforts over the past few weeks had showcased his ability before small numbers of teammates and coaches. His effort Saturday left the 13,000-plus watching in person and several thousand more viewing the game on television knowing this guy could play.

And that, really, is all Bivens wanted.

"I wanted to contribute," he said, "and I haven't been able to all year. All I want to do is fit in."

He did that Saturday. The Big Eight now knows who Donnell Bivens is.

Iowa State forward Donnell Bivens stuffs a shot by K-State's Maurice Brittian. The Cyclones beat the Wildcats 98-78 — the second time they have beaten K-State this season.

Track squads have solid weekend

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

Individual victories and personal records highlighted the weekend for the K-State men's and women's track teams.

The sprinters and athletes competing in field events participated in the Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., and the distance runners (800-meters and up) participated in the Iowa State Invitational in Ames, Iowa.

Although the goal to qualify some athletes for the NCAA Indoor Championships was not met, Coach John Capriotti said he was pleased with the outcome of the weekend.

"I was happy with our performances because these were two pretty good meets," he said.

In Ames, Clifton Etheridge and Connie Teaberry brought home first-place finishes in the long jump and high jump respectively.

Etheridge won the long jump with a leap of 25-1 1/4 and completed his day's work by placing second in the triple jump with a leap of 51-4 1/4.

The mark not only set a personal indoor record for Etheridge, but tied him with Iowa State's Desmond Hunt for the conference's longest triple jump of the season.

Teaberry, an All-American, tied her career best in the high jump with a winning leap of 6-0 1/4.

Personal bests were also achieved by R.D. Cogswell in the men's high jump with a fourth-place leap of 7-0 1/4 and Thomas Randolph in the 55-meter dash. Randolph's preliminary time of 6.23 sent him to the finals where he placed fourth with a time of 6.29.

The men's team got a third-place finish from Tyrone Watkins in the 400-meter run with a time of 47.74 and a fourth-place finish from the 4x400-meter relay team with a time of 3:15.02.

Women's 200-meter runners,

Markeya Jones and Latricia Joyner finished third and fifth respectively with times of 24.37 and 24.91.

Sprinter Nicole Green turned in a time of 55.49 to finish fifth in the 400-meters.

The Wildcat women distance runners made their mark by sweeping the 3,000-meter run. Jennifer Hillier placed first with a time of 9:35.76, Paulette Staats was second at 9:37.12 and Janet Treiber was third at 9:38.73.

Renee Russell captured second place in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 17:56.07 and Laura Ostmeyer added a third-place finish in the mile at 4:56.82.

On the men's side, David Warders and Todd Trask finished fourth and fifth respectively in the 5,000-meter run with times of 14:14.42 and 14:32.32.

Marcus Wright ran a time of 1:50.98 to place fifth in the 800-meters.

'Cat tennis team nets 1st dual win of year

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

After completing a full slate of tennis action in South Bend, Ind., this past weekend, the K-State women's team returned home with its first victory of the season.

The 5-4 victory over Purdue came on Sunday following two previous losses on Friday and Saturday at the hands of Drake, 5-4, and Notre Dame, 8-0.

Although the win was a long time in coming, Coach Steve Bietau said he was pleased to return with the win after a long weekend of competition.

"Overall, we didn't play our best today, but we did win," he said.

The team had some of its best individual performances of the season against Purdue, Bietau said.

Efforts from Suzanne Sim and Neili Wilcox were among them. Sim won her singles match 6-3, 6-4, and Wilcox won her singles match 6-4, 6-2. The two were then victorious in doubles 6-4, 6-0.

"Over the course of the weekend, Suzanne and Neili played an awfully important role and contributed a great deal to our progress," Bietau said.

Another winning performance came from freshman Michele Riniker as she defeated Purdue's No. 1 singles player, Eve Slowinski, in three sets 7-6, 6-7, 6-3, to pick up her second singles victory of the season.

Another victory was posted by Angie Gover, 6-1, 6-2, in her first singles outing of the season.

On Friday, the lady netters came up just short against Drake in their effort to capture the season's first win.

They produced three singles victories and one doubles victory in the weekend's opening dual.

The singles victories came from Riniker, 7-6, 7-5; Sim, 6-3, 5-7, 6-4; and Wilcox, 6-3, 6-4.

The lone doubles victory came from the tandem of Theresa Burcham and Rosemary Hunter, 6-4, 6-3.

On Saturday, Notre Dame dealt the Wildcat netters their third shutout loss of the season.

Bietau said a bright spot was provided by Riniker when she took Melissa Harris, currently ranked 45th in the nation, to three sets before losing, 5-7, 7-6, 6-1.

"Michele is continuing to improve her performance this season," he said. "She was in a good position to win the match."

Cyclones

Coming out with an 11-point lead for the second half, the ISU fireworks began. A 10-4 bolt to start the half put the game out of reach, and the only thing left undetermined was if the torrid Cyclones could reach the century mark.

"We were 'on' all ways: defensively, offensively, shooting the ball extremely well," Cyclone coach Johnny Orr said. "We never let them get in the game, particularly after about the first 12 minutes. It was a great road win for us, and I knew it was disappointing for them."

"How could I feel good coming in here? If I said I felt good coming into this game, then you would think I was crazy," Orr said. "They caught us on a good day. I can't explain it. If I could explain it we'd be 8-0 instead of 3-5."

Though no one expected a blow-out, certainly the production of Alexander, who accounted for 25 points in the game, came as no surprise. The 43 points that ISU's guard tandem of Doug Collins and Justus Thigpen combined for, while above their usual output, was not unbelievable.

What came as a shock was the contribution of forward Donnell Bivens, a little-used freshman who was inserted to contend with the small Wildcat lineup.

Bivens missed just once from the field and once from the line, finishing with 18 points.

Forward Wylie Howard and Iowa State center Victor Alexander battle for rebound under the 'Cats' basket in the first half of action in Bramlage Coliseum Saturday. The Cats' lost to the Cyclones' 98-78.

Guards

"We really had the fast break going," Thigpen said. "We were able to get the ball to the middle of the floor, and that was a big key."

When Thigpen wasn't driving the ball down the center of the floor, he was killing K-State from the perimeter. All seven of his second-half field goals came from outside.

"When I hit that first shot in the second half, I was ready to roll," Thigpen said. "The past few games, it's been like, 'Man, basketball is getting tough out here.' But today, I was there at the right time, and the ball was coming to me."

Students prepare for party

Chinese celebrate New Year as time of renewal, beginnings

HOPE SWARTZ
Staff Reporter

Don't be surprised if you hear sounds of partying and "Happy New Year" ringing out on the K-State campus Feb. 15. The New Year may have already passed for the United States, but the Chinese celebration is yet to come.

Jimmy Huang, president of the Chinese Student Association, said the New Year is a time of renewal in his homeland. In ancient times a large, horrible and mean dragon, Nien, would come to the people on the eve of the New Year. Families would come from all over to gather together and hide at the homes of their elder grandparents and parents.

The families would come out at midnight when Nien was gone and celebrate their being given another year. During this time people would wish each other happiness. People would visit neighbors to see if they too survived the dragon. Everyone would gather together and shoot firecrackers in order to assure themselves that the dragon was really gone for another year. The elders would give each child a red envelope of money as a sign of luck and prosperity.

"This whole time is a time of renewal," Huang said. "Each person becomes one year older and everyone is forgiven all the bad deeds they've done the year before."

In the Orient there are two weeks of festivals to celebrate the time of new beginnings. The final festival is the Festival of Lanterns March 1 when everyone hangs out lantern lights and shoots fireworks. The children are allowed to stay out all night and play among the lights.

The Chinese Student Association and Taiwanese Students are celebrating the New Year 3 p.m. Feb. 15 in the International Student Center. They expect a crowd of 50 people to join in the dancing and games.

The Vietnam Students are also hosting a celebration at the center. At 7 p.m. Feb. 23 they will celebrate "tet," or the New Year. They will have several dances in celebration, a fan dance and a Polynesian candle dance as well as a traditional costume dance.

Ha Ta, club president, said the Vietnamese tradition is for people to dress up like the gods and perform skits and dances. The final dance will be a dragon dance that will feature three people in a traditional five-foot dragon costume.

"My family is Buddhist so they stay up until midnight and have a sacrifice for deceased ancestors," Ta said. "We burn incense at the altar and present a sacrifice of food and fruits, which is not eaten until three days later. It's a time of remembrance."

"The New Year is also for the kids.

It's a time to wish them happiness, health and prosperity. The red envelope of money is still given to all the children."

The largest celebration will be that of the Chinese Students and Scholars from the People's Republic of China. About 350 students, alumni and guests will join the dancing and entertainment in the Cico Park building 5 p.m. Feb. 16.

It will feature all the traditional activities of a New Year's celebration. There will be singing, guitar-playing and folk songs as well as Western card games and dancing.

All the celebrations will feature traditions from different homelands with one notable exception. None will have fireworks. Huang said this is the one tradition the students will miss the most.

Conference prepares students for job hunt

DARLA GOODMAN
Collegian Reporter

Everyone wants all the help they can get with resumes, portfolios and interviews.

Students interested in communications can get that help and more at the K-State Ag Communications Conference Feb. 15-16. The event is sponsored by the Agricultural Communicators of Tomorrow.

Conference coordinator Darla Mainquist, junior in agricultural journalism, said the club invited ACT chapters from throughout the Midwest. Chapters from Texas and Missouri will attend, along with other communications majors.

The conference workshops and speakers will look at all areas of communication and the subjects will be student-oriented, Mainquist said. The future of communications as a whole will be discussed, with an emphasis on agriculture, but ideas will be applied to all areas of communication.

"The conference is intentionally designed to help the students formulate some career objectives and mainly serve as an impetus to additional studies in journalism," said ACT Adviser Larry Erpelding, associate director of resident instruction at the College of Agriculture.

Erpelding said the conference will focus on students and their planning for the future and not on technological growth of the field, although that will be a part of the discussion.

Mainquist said he encourages everyone to attend any part of the conference, because it will focus on the future of communications — what will happen in the 1990s and beyond.

Speakers include Hank Ernst, editor of Kansas Farmer and president of American Agricultural Editors' Association, and Fred Knop, editor of Drovers Journal and past president of the Livestock Publications Council.

Mainquist said Friday night's workshop will provide an opportunity for practical experience on putting a publication together.

Participants will take a variety of student publications from all over the Midwest and combine the best elements of each into one publication, he said.

Hopefully, we'll give the people who come into the conference a feel of what K-State's about.

—Doug Pleak
senior in animal sciences

Melanie Mainquist, farm store marketing manager for Cargill Nutrena Feeds, and Heidi Stichternath, communications director for Osborne Industries, will present a workshop on resumes, interviews and portfolios. Both are K-State alumni.

Doug Pleak, senior in animal sciences and industry with a communications option, is working with a committee of ACT members and K-State journalism students to prepare a video to show to conference participants that will introduce them to K-State.

"Hopefully, we'll give the people who come into the conference a feel of what K-State's about," Pleak said.

The video, which includes shots of campus and agricultural facilities, will be added to later in the spring and used for school and college recruitment.

Beth Gaines, senior in agricultural journalism, said the club has been making plans for the conference since last summer on the way back from the national ACT convention in Fort Worth, Texas, where she was elected national president of the organization.

Gaines said she hopes participants take practical knowledge away from the conference, like a new technique for writing leads or a special touch for resume writing or interviewing.

"This is something that all communications students can benefit from, not just ag communications students," Gaines said.

Corporations' values lacking

Speaker warns of moral breakdown

RYAN HAYTER
Staff Reporter

Irvine Hockaday Jr., president and chief executive officer of Hallmark Cards, Inc., warned students of the deteriorating social awareness of corporations in our society, during a lecture in the Union Little Theater Friday.

Hockaday, a featured speaker in the Distinguished Lecturer Series sponsored by the College of Business Administration, said, "While business appeared to be flourishing in the 1980's and astounding personal fortunes were being made, there was crop failure in crucial segments of society."

"We moved from being the world's largest predator to the largest debtor," he said.

Hockaday said businesses do not exist by divine right, and with their vast array of human and financial resources, they have a greater potential and greater obligation than any other segment in our society.

"Businesses are more than groups of people," he said. "They are subject to certain moral imperatives. Assets must be used wisely and with sensitivity."

Hockaday challenged students to take corporate responsibility as they become business leaders in the future.

"If we are isolated in pursuing our own individual dreams of success and forgetting about our own communities," he said, "we are in the process of undermining the tradition of our own freedom."

He said people need to be alert

No changes after rec bill rejection

LORIE BYSEL

Since the referendum for the expansion of Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex was turned down in early November, many of the work-out centers around town have seen a slight increase in memberships.

However the Rec Complex still has a big share of the college students.

"We have seen a small increase in memberships," said Sean Doerflinger, owner of Harbodies Gym. "But we haven't had any overcrowding yet."

Surah Richman, manager of Schliebe Workout Center said, "It's about the same as it usually is. We've seen a few more people from the rec come in."

This time of the year is the busiest because students are getting ready for spring break, said Raydon Robel, director of recreational services.

From 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. is the busiest time because everyone comes for the aerobics and there just isn't enough room for everyone, Robel said.

"It's usually really busy in the evening, more so since spring break is coming up," said Wende Luchinske, senior in social work and frequent user of the Rec Complex.

Since a lot of student's schedules are demanding, it is hard to find time to get in a work-out, and it seems everyone can only come in the evening so people have to stand around and wait to use the machines.

"Sometimes I have to leave and come back later," Luchinske said. "But my schedule is flexible and it allows me to do so."

"Sometimes it's hard to do what you want because there's too many people," said Chris Brunner, senior in mechanical engineering.

A week ago last Monday the Rec Complex hit an all time high of 4,007 people in one day to use the rec, Robel said.

"The program, interest and need are here," he said. "The sooner we can tackle and solve the problem, the happier the users will be."

Group's objective to benefit Manhattan

JEFF STURDY
Collegian Reporter

Silver Wings is a young organization on campus that has had some trouble getting off the ground.

"Our organization is made up of mainly college students," said Beth Bradley, commander of Silver Wings. "Basically, we do a lot of community service work."

This past semester Silver Wings has helped with such events as the Halloween Spook Fest at the Sunset Zoo and had a Christmas party for children at the Manhattan Day Care Center. The organization was also very involved with ceremonies for POW-MIA remembrance day and has also manned tables at the K-State Union selling bracelets with the names of veterans lost in the Vietnam War.

Silver Wings has been an organization at K-State since the fall of 1989, she said. Currently, Silver Wings has only 10 members.

"We are a nationally affiliated organization and we have to pay dues, many people simply can't afford it," Bradley said. "It also takes up a lot of time and some people don't have that much time to give."

Recruitment has also been slowed because it is generally thought that the organization has military ties, she said.

"We work with and share the same office space with Arnold Air Society, but we are not the ROTC," Bradley said.

Set backs have also slowed the progress of the organization, she said.

"When we started, the regional office sent me the paper work and then left everything up to me," Bradley said. "I had to make a lot of hard decisions on my own. There was no one to turn to, I got no support from the other offices."

Bradley said the Arnold Air Society is one organization that has helped Silver Wings get started.

"Arnold Air Society is a professional community service organization made up of Air Force ROTC cadets," said Cathy Barnes, AAS liaison to Silver Wings. "We are currently working with them on a Valentine's Day Dance at the Senior Citizen Center and others projects."

Efforts are being made to attract more members, Bradley said.

Non-soil study to benefit farmers

WADE RAMSEY
Collegian Reporter

When most people hear the word "hydroponics," they think of steamy greenhouses full of hanging plants with ripe over-sized fruits and long roots being sprayed with water.

Hydroponics is actually defined as the growing of plants without soil. This can be through a variety of techniques, such as keeping the roots in nutritional water or planting the plants in non-soil bases.

When the idea of hydroponics is presented by the media, they often give the impression that plant growth and crop yields in hydroponic systems will be much greater than in conventional soil systems, according to a publication by the Cooperative Extension Service.

Members of the horticulture faculty disagree with this portrayal by the media.

"Hydroponics is not as fantastic as originally thought. It's not the save-all of farmers. It's not any better than a soil system," said Charles Marr, professor of horticulture.

The nutritional value of a crop grown hydroponically is not superior to a crop grown by conventional soil methods, according to a publication by the Cooperative Extension Service. In fact, there are significant disadvantages to a hydroponic system.

"A hydroponic system is very expensive to set up and maintain. With the farm crisis and all, people can't afford to just set up a hydroponic system," Marr said. "It's very complex and detailed. It's not like falling off a log and walking away. It's a constant process."

Hydroponics is not as fantastic as originally thought. It's not any better than a soil system.

—Charles Marr
— professor of horticulture

"Disease is a major problem. In a soil system you can attempt to control the spread of disease. In a purely hydroponic system, disease can devastate the entire crop," said William Lamont Jr., associate professor in horticulture.

For the past 10 years, the Cooperative Extension Service has explored agricultural alternatives for farmers in Kansas by researching a variety of crops in specialty systems. Because a hydroponic system is so expensive with comparatively few benefits, the research focus at K-State is minimal.

"We have only one greenhouse with strawberries and peppers grown using hydroponic techniques," Marr said. "That's not a major part of our research."

The strawberries are cared for by a graduate student, while the peppers are cared for by routine greenhouse staff. But, neither are grown in a pure hydroponic system. Instead they are grown in a bag culture that contains peat moss and other non-soil media, Lamont said. "Hydroponic systems simply are not widely used in this state," Marr said. "Any sort of advantages are tempered by cost. It'll likely be a very long time before we see any field applications of hydroponics in Kansas."

"Right now there are a few farmers growing a small number of crops using hydroponics during non-harvest months as supplemental income, but nothing really substantial," he said.

With current cost levels, hydroponics simply does not make sense in temperate climates that allow soil systems, Marr said. There is somewhat more application of hydroponic systems in the Middle East where the arid climate makes non-soil systems more attractive.

Radiation leak controlled

Japanese nuclear reactor shut down due to abnormal levels

By the Associated Press

TOKYO — A day after a nuclear reactor shut down because abnormal levels of radioactivity were detected, there was no sign any radiation had escaped outside the plant, the company said Sunday.

The 13 monitoring posts within a mile of the Mihama Nuclear Power Plant in Fukui, western Japan, detected no evidence of radiation leakage by Sunday night, said Kenji Uchida of the Kansai Electric Power Co. The plant is 220 miles west of Tokyo.

Kansai Electric and government officials said the reactor began showing abnormal radioactivity readings in its secondary cooling system at 1:40 p.m. Saturday, when the reactor was operating at maximum capacity.

Workers manually started to reduce its output, and the 500,000-kilowatt reactor stopped 10 minutes later after the emergency system automatically began, they said.

It was the first time in Japan that an emergency core cooling system has shut down a reactor due to an actual accident, officials said. Such systems previously had been triggered three times because of system malfunctions.

Screaming Trees dodge stereotypes in new effort

Lanegan's mellow voice flows with ease

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

Since the spectrum of rock music is constantly expanding these days, some groups become harder and harder to classify. With their major label debut "Uncle Anesthesia," the Screaming Trees dodge labels and come up with a new, stirring form of rock.

During the past couple of years the Screaming Trees have done some independent label jumping, from SST records to Sub Pop and now to Epic. The subject of a major label bidding war, they took less money and signed with Epic after the highest bidding label told them to "lose one of the fat guys."

"Uncle Anesthesia" is the perfect name for this album. The songs creep up on you and dull your senses, but allow also for a few primal outbursts. Singer Mark Lanegan has a vocal style that immediately draws comparisons to Jim Morrison. His deep, mellow voice surprises the listener from song to song. Lanegan's melodies are simple, yet unpredictable, as they flow from one texture to another and the songs are riddled with catchy hooks.

Bassist Van Conner and his brother, guitarist Gary Lee Conner, create a wall of sound similar to that of the now-legendary Husker Du. This is most noticeable on the oddly upbeat "Ocean of Confusion." The production by Terry Date and Soundgarden's Chris Cornell keeps the guitars from becoming muddy, though, and keeps Lanegan's vocals audible.

Reviewer says ...

 'Total freaking godhead'

Oftentimes the Trees opt for more of a contrast. As drummer Mark Pickrel's beat becomes more and more frantic, the wailing guitars follow him, but Lanegan's singing is barely above a whisper.

This makes for great dynamics, but the frequent drop-outs in his voice makes a lot of the lyrics indistinguishable. One thing about the lyrical content, however, is clear. The Screaming Trees don't deal in politics and they don't preach about anything. Every song tries to create a mood, rather, through vocal imagery and different shades of guitar sound.

"Uncle Anesthesia" has a definite continuity. It starts with "Beyond This Horizon," a song that coasts along and fades directly into "Bed of Roses." These serve as a kind of introduction to their sound. Then, the album goes full circle through quirky, unusual songs and haunting melodies. "Something About Today" shows the band taking a traditional blues arrangement and giving it the Screaming Trees makeover. The album closes with "Closer," a slow, mournful tune that seems to sum up the strange trip you've taken for the last 47 minutes.

The Screaming Trees prove that rock can still stir emotion without any fancy tricks. These 13 short, simple songs are better than most of the bland formula rock on most radio stations today. So buy "Uncle Anesthesia" and enter the dimly lit, compelling world of the Screaming Trees.

Symposium shows teachers' role

KIMBERLY KOHLS
Staff Reporter

Education majors learned how they fit into the education puzzle at the Fourth Annual Education Symposium, Feb. 8 in the K-State Union.

The symposium's theme was "Piecing it All Together: The only piece missing is you."

"Teachers are just a part of the puzzle," said Cindy Doperalski, junior in elementary education and member of the symposium committee, during the symposium luncheon.

Teaching fits together with excellence, creativity, interaction, dedication, involvement, cooperation and ingenuity to complete the whole education puzzle. The sides of the teaching piece should never be straight, but curved. Teachers should be always growing, changing and getting new ideas, Doperalski said.

The symposium was one way to get these new ideas and helpful hints.

The symposium offered 16 sessions on topics varying from environmental education to critical thinking. The sessions were given by college professors, elementary and high school teachers and administrators.

The sessions topics are suggested by education members and are often about subjects not discussed extensively in education classes.

One of the sessions was titled "Our First Years in the Secondary School," with speakers from two area high schools. The two talked about their first years of teaching what to expect in the classroom. They also answered the audience's questions about discipline and coaching.

"This session was the most helpful to me," said John Bartel, senior in math education. "I will be student teaching next fall and this session soothed some of my fears and gave me some helpful tips that I can use in the classroom."

Dan Yunk, principal of Northview

Elementary in Manhattan, and Larry Dixon, principal of Junction City High School, spoke on interviewing. The two sessions were filled with students because many students are interested in how to prepare for interviews.

"They told me what I wanted to know about interviewing," Bartel said. "They also told us what they are looking for when they interview."

Bartel has attended the symposium the last three years and each year has learned from the sessions he has attended.

"The interview and first-year sessions gave me ideas and information that I have not been exposed to in education classes."

"The symposium excites me," said Rosemarie Deering, professor in education and symposium speaker. "It gives me a chance to tell others some of my ideas and gives the students an idea of what an education conference is like."

Judging team goes national

Livestock competitions give students chance to test skills in contest forums

SHANNAN SEELY
Agriculture Reporter

The K-State Livestock Judging team has traveled to Denver, Colo. and Fort Worth, Texas, for national competitions this semester.

In January a five-member team placed fourth at the National Western Livestock Judging Contest in Denver, Colo. About 24 senior college teams competed.

K-State also recently placed fourth in a Fort Worth contest where 19 teams participated. The contest was held in conjunction with the Southwestern Livestock Exposition.

The team won first in Denver's beef judging division, which is a combined score of placings and reasons in beef classes.

Jerry Grund, junior in animal sciences and industry, placed 10th individually.

"I hope I can get better and improve on it," Grund said.

Grund said the team's goal is to work to become the top two teams in the last fall contest in Louisville, Ky.

Grund and team members awoke at 5 a.m. and judged 12 classes of beef, swine and sheep, lasting until 6 p.m.

Along with placing classes, members also gave oral reasons on eight classes.

They had to convince the judges, or "reason-takers," why they placed the classes in a certain order. Team members recalled each class and, without notes, were required to complete each set in less than two minutes.

Some recent changes have made judging especially challenging, said Calvin Drake, team coach and professor in animal sciences and industry.

Team members usually placed a class of four animals on their appearance. Now, members also use production performance data available when deciding their placings.

Data information includes expected progeny differences, birth weights, weaning weights and milk production statistics for dairy animals.

A student is given a scenario on a sheet of paper that must be considered along with the muscling and structural make-up of the animal in some classes, Drake said.

"There's no science to it and there never will be," he said.

The team also competed in a unique contest at Denver — the carload contest.

The carload contest consists of ranking four beef carloads in order. Each carload has six animals.

Drake said members rank the animals according to most uniform set of six animals.

In the Fort Worth contest K-State placed second judging quarter horses. They also earned fourth in swine, fifth in sheep and fifth in cattle.

"Whenever you place in the top five in all the species, you've done very well," Drake said. "It's very seldom that it happens."

"We had high placings but our reasons are not good enough yet," he said.

Texas A & M, Colorado State and Texas Technical University placed first, second and third respectively.

Drake said eight members traveled to Fort Worth and participated in "work-outs" on the way.

They left Wednesday morning and practiced in Stillwater, Okla. They judged market steers and hogs in Chickasha, Okla. Then they drove to Denton, Texas, to judge quarter horses at four farms. After these workouts they traveled to Fort Worth.

Prior to traveling to competitions, they have practices three weekday afternoons and all day Saturday.

"It's the greatest program I've personally worked with and taken when I was an undergraduate," Drake said.

He said students learn how to make sound decisions under pressure. They also learn to stand on their feet and defend those decisions.

Brian Thiel, sophomore in agricultural education, said his schedule is demanding.

"A good livestock judge is a person with an objective mind that applies his or her priorities in different situations," he said. "It also needs to be someone who has a feel for livestock."

Ski clubs' tryouts begin

SCOTT FOWLER
Staff Reporter

The K-State men's and women's Water Ski Club will begin preparation this spring for the 1991 season, and a spring meeting for all students interested will take place later this month.

Stephen McDermit, club director, said official tryouts will take place the week before school begins in the fall.

The club, however, will participate in competition at KU in late April and another possible meet in Ohio in early May, McDermit said. He said there may be a spring tryout, but it has not been decided yet.

McDermit said two or three tournaments are scheduled in the fall, then the club competes in the Midwest Regional Tournament.

McDermit said 12 teams participate in the Midwest Regional Tournament and the K-State Water Ski Club placed fourth last year. He said that the top two teams in the tournament go on to nationals.

"Our ultimate goal is to go to nationals," McDermit said. "It looks like we can. If we improve this year at the same pace as we did last year, I am real positive we will go to nationals."

McDermit said anyone is welcome to try out for the club, but the National Collegiate Water Ski Association requires a 2.0 GPA for all members in order for them to compete.

He said a maximum of 30 men and women will be selected to the varsity squad, but that number will probably be considerably lower because some skiers compete in more than one event.

McDermit said prospects will try out in at least one of three categories of competition, which are slalom, trick and jump.

Devan Henton, junior in early child development, was a member of

New technology vital to K-State

Inventors sign patent rights to research foundation

BETH GAINES
Collegian Reporter

A better bat, stabilized vitamin C and a water purifier on the space shuttle. These are a few of the properties that have been patented at K-State through the K-State Research Foundation.

Researching new technology is an integral part of the University's mission, said John Walters, president of the K-State Research Foundation. Patenting technology helps to generate financial support for further research.

Timothy Donoghue, vice provost for research and dean of the graduate school, explained how the process of patenting begins at a seminar Wednesday.

"When a property is created at the University, and the property is potentially patentable, the inventors sign over the ownership rights to the research foundation. A disclosure form is then completed and submitted," Donoghue said.

The form is then reviewed by the K-State Patent Advisory Committee made up of six members appointed by the University President.

Robert Kruh, vice provost and member of the KSURF Advisory Board, said the committee looks for certain criteria when evaluating disclosure forms.

"The materials must be eligible and have patentability," Kruh said.

The committee also considers sponsor interest and if the invention can be effectively marketed, he said.

Meetings between the inventors and the committee can result in several options.

"First and least desirable," Kruh said, "is that the property is released back to the inventors."

Secondly, the committee could recommend KSURF go through a patent search, making sure the property is not already patented and finally proceed to patenting process, Kruh said.

John Collins, attorney, explained some of the legalities involved with applying for a patent.

"There are three criteria for patenting. A given invention must be new, useful and unobvious," Collins said.

"The unobvious is the most difficult to prove."

Public knowledge of the invention can also affect its eligibility for a patent.

"If a invention appears in a publication more than a year prior to filing a patent, or that patent is offered for sale in the same time frame, the patent is barred under U.S. law," he said.

Once a patent application is on file, the inventors are able to publish their findings and negotiate with firms about purchasing licensing rights.

There are many advantages for the inventors seeking patents. Collins said patenting an invention gives the holder exclusive rights to make, use and sell that particular invention for 17 years.

Royalties are a significant reason many inventors seek patents.

"The value of the patent depends upon the practicality of the process," Collins said.

Walters said net product sales are the basis for royalties. The typical amount is 3 to 5 percent of net sales.

From these royalties, the inventors then receive a 25 percent cut of the income and the department receives 10 percent.

The KSURF does not charge inventors fees for filing patents.

The process can be frustrating though. Collins said the average patent takes about 19 months to process.

Jack Lambert, chemistry professor emeritus, said the process of patenting is frustrating. "I've never had one go through on the first try," Lambert said.

When a patent is contested, many times the inventor and their attorney must go to Washington, D.C. to the federal patent office and testify on behalf of the invention.

Paul Seib, grain science and industry professor, said the whole process can be very aggravating.

"When the application is finally submitted, it must be complete," Seib said. "No attachments or additions may be made after filing the application. The feedback can also be lousy, and everyone tells you what's wrong with your invention."

With all the complications involved in obtaining a patent, many of the inventors find the end result worthwhile.

"The odds are low, but they're better than the lottery because you can make some impact," Seib said.

Memorial lists live veterans

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Fourteen Americans can visit the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and find their names carved in black granite among those who died in the war.

"It was kind of scary," said Eugene Toni, who lost part of both legs in Vietnam. "It's like seeing your name on a gravestone."

Toni's name is there because a government clerk typed a wrong number into a computer. All 14 computer records have been corrected, but the names can never be erased from the polished granite.

"It's a very sobering thing," said former Spec. 4 Andrew J. Hilden, who found his name in 1987.

the club last year.

"If anyone wants to try out, they should practice as much as possible during the summer," she said.

Henton said during tryouts each skier gets six chances in the slalom and jump category and two in the trick.

McDermeit said a 32-mph run in the slalom would probably make the varsity team in the men's division. He said a jump of 70 feet would probably justify a varsity spot for the men.

He said the women's division is not as competitive and encouraged all women to come out.

Henton likes the competition involved with the jump. "It is more competitive because you are always worried about beating someone else's jump," she said.

"It's challenging and takes a lot of endurance and strength," Henton said. "You have to be able to hold on to the rope for a long period of time."

McDermeit said he would keep an unlimited number of skiers on the B team, and they would have opportunities to challenge A team skiers for varsity spots.

McDermeit said some skiers are lifting weights at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex during the off-season.

Henton said she body builds as a hobby during the off-season and it keeps her in shape for water-skiing.

into the streets to pick up candy and toys thrown by the parade marchers.

The parade lasted for an hour. Afterwards, there were still people talking and mingling among themselves before they left for home.

Specialist Jerry Green, National Guard soldier stationed in Belleville, was setting up a weapons display two blocks from where the parade started. Near the display was a large refueling truck and an armored personnel carrier for the departing parade spectators to look over.

"I thought the parade was great," Green said. "It is certainly larger than last year's fall parade."

Later in the evening, Nancy Greenwood, co-coordinator of the parade, said there were 131 confirmed groups participating in the parade. People were also signing up, just minutes before the parade started. After the parade, according to the registration cards, there were more than 2,500 participants in the parade.

Greenwood said she and Garlow were happy with the parade.

"We did well," Greenwood said. "Now we are deciding whether to have a welcome home parade."

of changes in the world.

"Don't confine yourselves to limitations of your predecessors," Hockaday said. "Don't be afraid to challenge old ideas that may be past their due."

Hockaday said that it's more important than ever for individuals in business to address society's biggest problems now.

"If leaders don't answer these questions, sooner or later the answers will be imposed on us," he said. "If organizations are not responsible, over time the public will speak up to increase regulations, increase financial pressures and push with more effective consumer boycotts."

He said statistics show a deterioration of our societal infrastructure and a collapsing sense of community.

"There are societal forces now at work which may require redefinition of the role of business in tomorrow's world," he said. "To survive, we've got to get the business community to do the right thing. We have to integrate social responsibility in to the very fabric of practiced corporate values."

Students to spend summer on project

BETH PALMER
Collegian Reporter

About 40 students will be spending their summer in Kansas rural towns as part of a community service project.

The program is designed to have students combine academic skills with real-life situations, said Carol Peak, director of Community Service Programs.

Students will go into the community for eight weeks and work with the citizens in an area where the town needs improvement. Ten communities are taking part this summer, and four or five students will go to each town.

There are several different projects ranging from a cultural arts center in Salina to a master plan for a lake in Jetmore.

One project has a team of four going to Kingman to help research historical buildings and homes in the area. The community will use the findings to determine tourism possibilities. The team is also working on updating and improving the plans for the city park.

Community Service organizers sent applications to various communities and waited for the them to return with a request for some type of service, Peak said.

The program's organizers determine which projects students could do and look for student volunteers, said Mark Hager, graduate student in speech. Hager was a student volunteer two summers ago and is a coordinator for the summer teams.

"The goal of the program is to teach students about rural communities and what it means to be a citizen," Hager said.

Students apply in September each year with a written application, resume, transcript and personal interview. There is a GPA guideline of 3.0, and students of junior level or above are preferred although these aren't set requirements.

"The students should have enough course work in their major to do what the community needs them to do," Peak said.

By mid-November students are selected and assigned to teams made of different majors. The teams are assigned a faculty member recruited in the fall to be a mentor.

In the spring semester those students involved enroll in a three-credit hour course where they meet with their team's mentor once a week, creating the projects and trying to improve them.

"I'm interested to see how to go into a community and set up a program like that and make it work," said Gwen Jarnagin, junior in social work. Jarnagin is a team member going to Greensburg to work on a productive aging program.

The students also read the community's newspaper on a regular basis and will take a site visit to their assigned community this month to gain a better understanding of the town.

Communities that want to commit to the program pay $1,000, which will be paid to the students. Other than that the program is completely funded by grants and outside sources, Peak said.

"We do provide a stipend and a scholarship for the students so they have a way to pay for their education. It replaces their lost summer income," she said.

The communities also offer office space and provide students with host families to live with for the summer.

"It will be interesting to see if we can make a difference," Jarnagin said.

ASK travels to Statehouse

Students lobby for priority higher education issues

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

About 35 K-State students, representing the Associated Students of Kansas, traveled to the Statehouse Monday morning to lobby for priority higher education issues.

The ASK representatives met at the Statehouse at 8 a.m. to spend the day meeting with legislators to lobby for the ASK priority issues.

"We need a strong showing of K-State students," said Jake Reisinger, senior in accounting and K-State ASK director. "This will show the legislators that the students from K-State want this."

Sunday evening, at a lobbyist training session, Reisinger said ASK's priorities for this session include:

- Full funding for the base budgets of the universities recommended by the Kansas Board of Regents.

- Full funding for the third year of the Margin of Excellence.

- Increase of fee waivers for graduate teaching assistants from 75 percent to 100 percent.

- Passage of the Youth Education Service Program into state statute with an increase of funding.

- Full funding for the financial-aid package requested by the regents. Reisinger said that student representatives from all the regents institutions would be lobbying for ASK priorities.

Sen. Don Montgomery, R-Sabetha, told three K-State lobbyists the general economy of Kansas is still depressed, and the collection of revenue has fallen off by $26 million dollars.

"Where are you kids going to get the money? You need to have that in your priority," Montgomery said. "(Students) come up here to ask, but don't have any ideas on how to pay for it."

Montgomery said he wasn't optimistic about Gov. Joan Finney's tax proposal. There isn't much support in the Senate for eliminating the exemptions the governor has proposed.

Finney's tax proposal would broaden the sales tax base by eliminating most existing exemptions and taxing most services open new sales tax exemptions. This would provide an additional $474.4 million in revenue, he said.

However, Montgomery said he had no problem with funding education, provided the funds are available. He said he considers education as economic development.

"I'll support whatever we can give for education," Montgomery said. "I will work to maintain the base budgets, and I would like to see the third year of the Margin of Excellence funded."

After the meeting with Montgomery, Jim Persinger, sophomore in political science, said he wasn't discouraged and was still optimistic about funding for ASK priorities.

"I guess we will be struggling for our educational funding, but we must always be positive," Persinger said.

Across from Sen. Montgomery's office, Sen. Jim Allen, R-Ottawa, told the ASK representatives the Legislature would do the best it could to find funding.

He said he doesn't support Finney's tax proposals, but there will have to be some type of revenue increase.

"I'll be up front with you," Allen said. "The revenue isn't there right now. My main concern is the state government funding of this blue book here, the state budget."

After the meeting with Allen, Diane Pratt, sophomore in interior design, said she thought Allen valued higher education deeply.

"He wants to help us as much as possible, but he also has a concern for the taxpayer," Pratt said. "The money has to come from somewhere."

Rep. Bill Roy Jr., D-Topeka, said he supported many of the ASK priorities, such as the Margin of Excellence, protection of base budget funding, and the YES program.

However, Roy said to reduce the amount of money spent on higher education, the regents must make some changes. First, the community colleges and Washburn must be placed in the regents system. Next, the regents need to avoid duplication of highly specialized areas.

"Where is Washburn on the list? When you visit, Shawnee county representatives are going to ask you this," Roy said. "I think we need to bring Washburn in, this would bring more tax dollars in as well."

Roy also felt Finney's tax proposals wouldn't be implemented, but he was confident there would be a number of new proposals soon.

"We will end up with a hybrid tax proposal later," Roy said.

Sen. Frank Gaines, D-Augusta, said K-State has been treated unfairly compared to the other universities in Kansas.

"K-State is the one that gets in on the short end of the stick," he said.

Gaines said the current tax system is corrupt because special interest groups, such as business groups and farmers, have avoided the state sales tax.

"Take all the tax exemptions and repeal them. I am in favor of it. This will undo all the damage they have done for 20 years," Gaines said. "I won't favor any tax increase, but I favor Finney's proposed tax shift."

The ASK representatives were also asked questions during their meetings. The legislators interviewed all agreed that education, especially higher education, needs to be funded. They stressed, however, the funds simply aren't available this fiscal year to fund all of the ASK priorities. Finney's tax proposals appear to be headed for scrutiny, revision and possible defeat.

Todd Heitschmidt, K-State student body president, said ASK lobbying was a complete success. He was particularly pleased with the student support.

"We did a lot of informing. Everything went smoothly," Heitschmidt said. "This was very productive in promoting the positions of ASK and K-State."

Finney's tax plan to hit consumers

CHRISSE VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

Gov. Joan Finney's proposed service tax would result in higher prices for consumers as businesses pass on the tax to their customers.

Finney proposes eliminating 35 exemptions to the statewide 4.25 cents on-the-dollar sales tax and adding the sales tax to 77 broad categories of professional services. In Riley County, the sales tax would be 5.75 cents on the dollar because of a 1.5-cent local sales tax.

Haircuts, attorney fees, architect and engineering fees, utilities, funeral services and others would be affected by Finney's proposal.

"Each funeral account would go up at least $100," said Jim Snyder, executive director of the Kansas Funeral Directors Association.

Snyder said the proposed tax would raise the already high overhead costs of a funeral director.

"Our accountants, attorneys and utilities would have to pass on their service tax to us," he said. "Then we'll have to pass it on, plus our own service tax, to our customers."

Snyder said the tax would create more problems than it will solve.

"It adds an additional burden at a time of sorrow — it's an unfair situation," he said.

Mark Willingham, manager of Ray's Hair Maxim, said the proposed tax is a double tax.

"Say we make $10," he said. "We already pay tax on that income, then the consumer would have to pay extra tax on top of that."

Lu Willingham, owner of Ray's Hair Maxim, said customers will probably wait longer to come in for a haircut or permanent if the tax is implemented.

"It will really cut down our business," she said. "This profession is already diluted with too many employees, and a new tax isn't going to help out at all."

Willingham said because she sells hair-care products, she already has a tax number, but this would pose a problem for some salons that don't.

Lawrence Brennan, AIA architect, said Finney is trying to spread taxes to different areas to get relief for property taxes.

"The impact on me would be paperwork," he said. "I'd have to fill out forms for every client to send to the state and charge clients more because of the increase in bookkeeping."

"If there was a $10 million project, with an architect fee of $1 million, the increase in tax would be $42,500," he said.

Brennan said in the current recession, every dollar counts, and a client wouldn't hesitate to go elsewhere. "I don't like it, and I'm against it," he said.

Not everyone is against the tax though. Stephan Berland, president of BG Consultants, said there is an overload on property tax, and if someone doesn't own property, they pay nothing.

"I think Finney is right on for trying to make everyone pay on some basis. It is a benefit because right now the property owners are paying it all," he said.

Some business people said the problem with the tax plan is the difficulty in determining what is going to be taxed.

"Are they going to tax the fees collected or the value of the services?" said Barry Clark, a Manhattan attorney, referring to pro-bono services that are priced lower or offered free to financially troubled people.

"We have fixed expenditures, so we must pass on the cost to clients. This is unfortunate since people have to have our service to get justice," he said. "It's unfair that the little guy has to pay the same percentage sales tax as a millionaire."

Radio station threatens KSDB

Spoof using sound plugs taken from KJCK, KMKF leads to possible lawsuit

SHANNON HEIM
A&E/Features Editor and
DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

KSDB-FM 91.5's satirical spoof of two other local radio stations' plugs isn't tickling as many funny bones as expected.

After hearing the station identification sweepers of KJCK-FM 94.5 and KMKF-FM 101.5 claiming they were, respectively, "flame-throwing" and "butt-jarring" radio stations, KSDB station manager, Joe Montgomery, said he thought it would be amusing to make a similar announcement — but in a funny way.

Because he wanted to make sure there would be no legal problems, Montgomery said he looked up fair-use law in a couple of books.

"What I found says it's OK if done in satire because it's considered legitimate critical comment," Montgomery said.

With this assurance, he proceeded to record the KMKF and KJCK sweepers off the air, edited them so they no longer included the stations' names and then added three different tags to the end.

One tag said KSDB does not advocate the use of flame throwers or nuclear and chemical weapons — it supports peace. Another said it sounds like the other stations want to burn the listeners' ears off, and KSDB does not.

KSDB disc jockeys played the new, altered sweep for about two weeks until Montgomery received a call from KMKF program director Jason Whisnand.

"He heard it and didn't appreciate it," Montgomery said. "He thought we were trying to infringe. He asked us to pull them off or he would have his lawyers contact my superiors."

Fifteen minutes later, Montgomery also got a call from the Philadelphia production company that made the original sweep for KMKF, he said.

"The guy tried to explain it to me, but he said he didn't really know either," Montgomery said. "They felt KMKF had an exclusive contract, and it might have been alright if we got a different announcer."

"I think as long as you don't use an entire work in a competing situation it should fall under fair use," he said, "but he said it was best just to

Air strikes continue pounding Iraqi forces

Bush says ground war can wait, condemns Saddam's use of exaggerated casualties

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Monday he will hold off a ground war against Iraq while allied forces continue pounding Saddam Hussein's forces with air strikes that have been what he termed effective.

"We are going to take whatever time is necessary to sort out when a next stage might begin," Bush said on the 26th day of the war after meeting with top military advisers just back from the Persian Gulf.

The White House complained that Saddam was reaping dividends by exaggerating civilian casualties from allied bombings.

"The propaganda and public relations battle is where Hussein is scoring his points," presidential press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said.

Referring to Mikhail Gorbachev's weekend criticism concerning civilian losses in Iraq, Fitzwater said, "It's disturbing to find this evidence that somebody's buying it."

Iraq has been expressing impatience for a ground war, seemingly believing its modern tanks and artillery, equipped with chemical- and biological-tipped warheads, can inflict heavy casualties on the U.S.-led allies.

But Bush declared, "We are not going to suit somebody else's timetable, whether he lives in Baghdad or anywhere else."

He made his statement after receiving a 1½-hour briefing from Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who returned Sunday night from meetings with military commanders at the war front. The meeting also was attended

Student hears from father after he escaped from Kuwait

MIKE MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

For Monica Kelly, senior in marketing and management, the waiting is finally over.

On Dec. 11, after her father spent almost four months hiding in Abu Halifa, Kuwait, she was able to see him again.

"I was relieved to get out of Kuwait," Stephen Kelly said, who had lived there since March of 1984.

Kelly said he did not anticipate the invasion at all.

"Arabs generally solve problems through consensus and meetings," he said.

Kelly said he did not find out about the invasion until the next morning when a friend called and told him.

"I was just stunned," he said.

His daughter said she responded in the same way.

"I was in disbelief," Monica Kelly said. "My dad reassured me that everything was peaceful — I was shocked."

After the invasion started, the first thing Kelly tried to do was call his family, but he couldn't dial out because the long distance lines were down.

That was to be the first of many changes in his Kuwaiti lifestyle after the invasion.

For the first two weeks he could move around freely but on Aug. 18,

Iraq announced intentions to arrest all guests, so Kelly said he restricted his movements outside his living area.

But it wasn't until Aug. 31, when the Iraqis started going through buildings one by one looking for Americans, that Kelly and his friends sealed off the building they lived in and went into hiding for good.

"Iraq beat on the doors, but didn't knock any in," he said. "They were beating on my door with rifle butts."

Americans who answered their doors were arrested, so he hid under his bed.

"They would have found me, but I didn't know what else to do," Kelly said. ■ See KELLY, Page 8A

U.S. opens Ukrainian consulate

KIEV (AP) — After 15 years, the United States is opening a consulate this month in the Ukrainian capital, drawing cheers from independence activists who are courting Western support.

U.S. officials, wary of stirring trouble for President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, say the consulate's opening does not mean diplomatic recognition or support for an independent Ukraine, the second most populous of the 15 Soviet republics.

"It's not our policy to confer recognition if the matter hasn't been resolved by the Soviets themselves," said a Western diplomat in Moscow who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Activist goes on hunger strike

BEIJING (AP) — Looking pale and thin from a four-day hunger strike, a leading democracy activist told a court Monday that the sedition charge against him was unfair and incorrect, sources close to his family said.

Chen Ziming, the 38-year-old founder of a private research institute, began the hunger strike Thursday in an attempt to postpone the trial so his lawyer would have more time to prepare a defense.

His lawyer was allowed access to the government materials on Chen only last week after his charges were formally lodged with the court.

Educators oppose activities bill

TOPEKA (AP) — If a bill requiring students to maintain a 2.0 grade point average to participate in extracurricular activities becomes law, the state's dropout rate could skyrocket, legislators were told Monday.

Educators from across the state testified before the House Education Committee. All said they oppose the bill because they think it would cause at-risk students to drop out of school. Some, however, said they support the intent of the measure.

Under the bill, primary and secondary students would have to maintain a 2.0 GPA, or C average, in at least five subjects each grading period, and have completed five subjects with a 2.0 GPA during the preceding grading period. The subjects could not be classes the student was taking over to get a passing grade.

Rep. Michael O'Neal, R-Hutchinson, and the bill's sponsor, was its sole supporter.

He said he did not want to be a grinch, but that the state is not expecting enough from its students. Currently they are required to maintain only a D-minus, or minimum passing grade, in five new subjects each grading period.

Nelson Hartman, executive director of the Kansas State High School Activities Association, said he agreed with the philosophy of the bill, but couldn't support it because it could cause students to drop out.

"The bottom line is, we're trying to encourage every student in the state of Kansas to stay in school and gain that high school diploma," he said.

Brothers recycle birthday card

HASTINGS, Neb. (AP) — When Floyd Marian got a birthday card nearly 16 years ago with the word recycle written on it, he sent it back.

Now Marian and his brother, Earl, of Overland Park, have made a tradition of recycling that same card every year since.

"It's just kind of a family joke," Floyd Marian said. "It's just between my brother and I."

Floyd Marian, a 66-year-old retired school teacher, said he received the blue oblong Hallmark card for his birthday, Dec. 10, 1975. The card shows Peanuts character Linus saying, "This is the age of ecology!" Inside it reads "Don't throw this card away ... Recycle it to a friend."

That's what Floyd Marian did. Birthday messages cover the inside of the card like graffiti, but Floyd plans to continue the trade for many years.

"It's in good condition, considering," he said.

Judge denies Copeland motions

ROLLA, Mo. (AP) — A judge Monday denied defense motions to accept a guilty plea and have jury selection held elsewhere as the trial of an elderly northwest Missouri farmer accused of five murders began.

Circuit Judge E. Richard Webber refused last month to allow Ray Copeland, 76, to plead guilty as part of a deal to avoid the death penalty.

Copeland is charged with first-degree murder in the deaths of five transients he allegedly used in cattle swindles from 1986 to 1989.

OPERATION DESERT STORM

Wives help one another

ALISA DIETZ
Collegian Reporter

Since Polly Christensen's husband was deployed Dec. 16 in the Persian Gulf, she has received six letters from him but not yet a phone call.

She said she believes the reason he has not called is because he takes his job very seriously and would be working instead of waiting in line for the telephone during his free time.

He is very dedicated to his job and believes in fighting for America's rights, she said.

He once told her that if he could save one man's life due to his company being ready, it would be worth the extra time he puts in, she said.

"If my husband or anyone else's spouse would get killed over there, I consider them a hero."

Reane Mims' husband has also been deployed. She said she has heard from him six times since he left Dec. 21. She has received three letters and three phone calls, two of which have been since the war began.

The soldiers get to call periodically as they get to go to town, Mims said. He always calls in the middle of the night because he gets free time in the afternoons over there.

Mims has two sons, Ronnie, 13, and Jason, 12. The boys seem to be doing pretty well, she said.

"The only big difference I've noticed is they watch the news more than usual."

Christensen and Mims are both members of support groups. The wives of their husbands' units or companies meet a few times a month.

"We discuss our fears, talk about things to help each other out. We discuss what is available for discounts and communications with our men," Mims said.

"We also have a calling tree to call someone if they are going through a hard time," she said.

Christensen said most of the wives are staying here instead of going back to their hometowns.

"It would be more destructive for my daughter and me to uproot and go back home because my friends and my work are here now," Christensen said.

"I feel closer to information about Big Red One here in Manhattan also. There is not much specific information about Fort Riley in other areas of the country," she said. "The people of Manhattan have been great."

Mims said she wants to be waiting here for her husband when he gets home, because this is his home.

"I'm so proud of our troops, they are fighting for our rights and our country, I just wish them the best and more power to them," Christensen stated.

CHRISTOPHER T. ASSAF/Staff
In May of last year, Lynne and Gary Bedenharn opened On the Wild Side in Aggieville, a store specializing in 1960s and 1970s memorabilia. The Bedenharns came to Kansas from upstate New York.

Aggieville store expands, owners add merchandise

JIM STRUBER
Consumer Reporter

Even Manhattan has a wild side. "This is something new and different for Manhattan — Manhattan is kind of not with it," said Lynne Bedenharn, co-owner of "On the Wild Side," a new store in Aggieville.

"We started out as a full-fledged art gallery May 1, 1990," she said. "We still carry almost all the art we started with — it is all crammed in the back. We are always getting new artwork in all the time."

Lynne and Gary Bedenharn said they found inspiration to expand their shop when they traveled to Colorado Springs last summer and visited similar shops located there.

They also found a distributing company for the glass beads, jade and crystals they sell. The Bedenharns said customers make their own necklaces, bracelets and anklets with the materials.

"We bring stuff here because people had to go out of their way to travel to Lawrence or Kansas City to get the beads and Deadhead stuff," he said.

In January, when they started receiving more customers, they invested some of their money into baja and tie-dyed shirts, all kinds of hats and 1960s and 1970s tapestries, he said.

"This is really new to the store," he said, pointing toward the wall and the display racks. "We now have Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, the Grateful Dead, and don't forget Jim Morrison and the Doors. This is stuff I like."

The Bedenharns said the business is like a '60s revival store and they sell the merchandise they both personally enjoy.

"I thought I would bring it to the public," he said.

"The Manhattan community is very conservative," she said. "Well, we are not conservative. That is why we are in Aggieville — it is a little more relaxed here."

The Bedenharns said they have combined the '60s and '90s into one shop.

"It is really hard to explain, it is just different times thrown together — but it all works," she said.

"So far I think our business is expanding a lot faster than we predicted. When we first started we had a wall here," he said.

"I think with the Persian Gulf War, people are a lot more into peace signs. They are getting more relaxed and the music of the '60s has a little more meaning," he said. "It's like a revival kind of thing. But there have always been Deadheads from years and years and years — doesn't matter what generation you are from."

Bedenharn said he hasn't always been into peace signs.

"Well, when I was 17, I joined the Marine Corps and wanted to be a warmonger," he said. "Actually I figured my dad has been in the service 27 years — why not do my time?"

They plan on opening a larger business in Aggieville in about five years. However, they wouldn't go into detail as to what type of business this would be.

"It is still under works if we decide to do it," she said. "It must remain a secret."

Families of soldiers to receive tax break

By the Collegian Staff

Income taxes are an item soldiers assigned to the Desert Storm combat area will not have to worry about right now.

The federal government is giving Desert Storm soldiers and their spouses a grace period for filing their taxes.

LeLuan Shrimplin of H & R Block said the soldiers do not have to file until 180 days after they are out of the combat area. The government will disregard any collection or examination action that would be standard procedure. Government will waive all interest and penalties until those soldiers file.

This also applies to a soldier who is injured and is being treated in a hospital. He or she has 180 days to file after recovery.

If a spouse chooses to file as usual, that person can become authorized with a general power of attorney, said James Manuszak from the IRS service center in Wichita.

"It's best to have general authorization," he said.

That will take care of everything that needs to be done with just one spouse preparing the forms, he said.

If the spouse is hiring a representative to complete their tax forms, Manuszak said to print DESERT STORM at the top of the tax form and on the outside of the envelope. This will guarantee special attention to the forms and assurance of no penalties.

The combat zone President Bush declared includes the Arabian peninsula and surrounding waters.

Oil spill endangering sea cows

By the Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — One of the world's largest herds of sea cows lies directly in the path of an oil slick creeping down the Persian Gulf coast, authorities said Monday.

"Protecting them is definitely beyond our capacity," said Khaled Fakhro, vice-president of Bahrain's Environmental Protection Committee.

Fakhro said an estimated 900 sea cows, known as dugongs, live in the Bay of Salwa between the island nation of Bahrain and the Qatar peninsula.

The beasts are relatives of the threatened manatee species, which lives in shallow tropical waters in North and South America. Like their cousins, the mammals breed on land and suckle their young on their backs in the water.

Fakhro told a symposium on the spill that the crude, which has been killing wildlife and fouling dozens of miles of beaches in Saudi Arabia, would reach Bahrain and the bay in about a week.

Gulf war demands personal awakenings

As the Persian Gulf War continues to unfold, I find myself wondering what the hell is going to happen. I don't doubt the outcome of the actual war. By this point, I think it's pretty clear that we're going to do whatever it takes to ensure success. I don't find fault with that. In the immortal words of my old high school football coach, "If you're going to do something, you might as well do it right."

My worry relates to the situation here at home. The American people are being sold a package of goods about this war that's leading us straight back to something out of a bad World War II movie. The kind of movie where 12 guys with machine guns defeat the entire German army and still find time to fall in love with the local peasant girl. In fact, the kind of movie where war is portrayed as glorious and a way to prove your manhood.

I think the media has to assume a large portion of the blame for this mentality. In Vietnam, people saw stories that were more than just military recruiting material. People saw American dead and wounded. They saw the problems of leadership that plagued the American forces. They saw the dirt and grime and could almost even smell the sweat.

In simple terms, America was forced to confront a war that wasn't always positive.

Every day was a question of whether or not the benefits of the Vietnam experience outweighed the costs. Eventually, the answer was no.

The folks at the Pentagon learned their lesson. If you censor the media in its coverage of war, you can turn the reports coming out into nothing more than a glowing endorsement of what you're doing. As much as the Armed Forces saw the media as a hindrance during Vietnam, in the Gulf they see them as their own personal press agency.

I don't fault the Pentagon. It's just a part of that "football coach" philosophy. The sadness is that the media plays the role. I'd rather see nothing than the stories coming out of Saudi Arabia at the present time. In the last week, I've seen stories on the return to glory of battleships and press conferences with Nintendo-like images of planes blowing up bridges.

What I haven't seen is anything about the 11 soldiers killed by friendly fire. I haven't heard any interviews with soldiers who think that we shouldn't be there. The truth is there, but it's not getting out.

What scares me most is that we're buying this crap hook, line and sinker. We sit down after work or class with T.V. dinners and watch Coach Colin Powell give us our daily

Shawn
Bruce

Collegian Columnist

15-minute pep talk. Then we flip over to watch whatever the hell fodder the networks are serving up that evening.

Then when pollsters come and survey us to see if we think Bush is doing a good job, we give him approval ratings in the 80th and 90th percentiles—slightly above Santa Claus and advancing on Jesus Christ. The reason? It's the only game in town.

I'm sorry folks. It's too damn simple. You can talk of a "return to innocence and other things that made this country great" if you want. I like to call it a return to ignorance.

I used to have a lot of respect for pro-war demonstrators. I still do, for some. But somewhere along the line, they've adopted an ends-justifies-the-means philosophy. In my book, despite the flag waving, yellow ribbons, and talk of patriotism, that makes them traitors to the America that I love.

I saw a pro-war group marching on the campus of Wichita State University recently. They came across an anti-war group who was having a silent prayer meeting. The pro-war group commenced to surround the anti-war group and chant, "U.S.A., U.S.A.," until the anti-war group left. Then they cheered. I remember thinking, "What better way to support your country than breaking up a prayer meeting?"

Here in Manhattan, a peace group has been forced to move their rallies to inside a church, rather than continuing to hold them outside. The reason? Someone stopped and yelled at a child who was with the parents. I can't even come up with a retort for this one. Some things I can't understand.

Too many conversations these days are beginning with "If you loved your country, you would..."

"Do what," I ask? Go around looking for prayer meetings to break up? Tell Iraqi jokes in bars? How about firebombing grocery stores owned by anyone who wears Arab clothing?

Sorry folks. Not my style. I pray to God that someday it's not anyone's. I understand getting caught up in a bad scene and circumstances beyond your control. That happens to us all.

But, you've got to maintain your individuality. That's what patriotism is all about. Speaking up if you're in the majority, but also giving time and attention to those who differ. I truly believe America would be a lot better off if each of us took full advantage of our rights and stopped trying to take other's rights away.

So march away. But question yourself while you do it. Force yourself to see the costs of the war. Above all else, realize that when you stop questioning, you stagnate. The heart beats on, but the soul dies.

I'm going to receive letters on this column. Some will like it, and I thank you in advance. Some will criticize it in a way that makes me really question what I've written here today. You are the ones I thank the most.

Some are going to revolve around a "Don't question my patriotism or I'll kick your ass" mentality. Those I'll read too. Because they make me realize that as a U.S. citizen, an individual and a patriot, I have a lot of work to do to make this a "kinder, gentler nation" in more than just words. In the words of Bono, "I'm wide awake. I'm not sleeping."

Somebody changed the rules and didn't tell the students.

When the idea of renovating the Catskeller into the K-State Union Station was presented to the students, the powers that be promised a place to relax, have a good time and study if students wanted.

The selling point of the Union Station was that it would not take away study areas sorely needed at K-State.

Rather, the station would serve as a place students could go at night for non-alcoholic fun.

Mike Ribble, former program adviser for Union Program Council, was quoted in a Feb. 19, 1990 issue of the Collegian as saying that students would be able to study in the bar during the day.

He said, "I have a feeling it will be somewhat similar to the Stateroom, kind of an area where there's noise going on but people tend to study anyway."

Ribble said the bar would serve a multi-faceted function as a study area, meeting area and a place to watch television.

The idea of the study area was dropped conspicuously during the summer when the majority of students were absent from campus, and when Teto Henderson took over as manager.

He explained several times that the bar was simply a place for students to have "some good times and relax without alcohol."

Cynthia Schmidt, student manager of the Union station, recently argued in a letter to the editor that the Union Station was built "not to replace a study area, but to provide a place to forget about studies for a while."

She said if the Union had wanted people to study, they would not have removed the Catskeller.

She made no mention of what the students wanted.

Neither Henderson nor Schmidt faced the fact that the number of places to study is steadily decreasing on campus and that taking away one more would put even more stress on other already full-capacity areas.

The original idea of the Union Station as a study area that doubles as a non-alcoholic bar should be stuck to. Students who wish to relax and have fun are invited, and those who have studies to finish would be welcome also.

This is what the students wanted.

It's not what the students got.

Another perspective

The federal government has a tidy little way of paying for things it can't afford — it doesn't include them in the budget.

President Bush unveiled his budget plan Monday. Faced with a projected record federal deficit in 1991 and the second-largest deficit next year, he conveniently left the gulf war out of the budget. The savings and loan bailout is already outside the regular budget.

Perhaps the government could start a second budget. It could be called the "non-budget budget" and include those items we can't afford. There could be regular taxes and non-budget taxes, earmarked specifically toward the two kinds of expenditures.

Even without the war, the deficits will be staggering. After last fall's budget fight, lawmakers agreed to raise taxes and to cut spending by $500 billion over the next five years.

But that agreement was deceptive if deficits will still be the largest in history. The least budget planners could do would be to include all expenditures in the budget.

Environmentalism starts with self

I expected today to be a perfectly normal day, in so far as my days are always normal. Skip some classes, do the crossword puzzle, eat a little, sleep a little, watch television and go to bed. Little did I know that sometime during the night my conscience, normally a fairly quiet little alter ego, had become environmentalistic. I admit, it would have been infinitely more inconvenient if my conscience had suddenly discovered major religion or something, but environmentalism is bad enough.

I woke up much as usual with a violent whack at that horrid little beeping box that haunts my dreams. I ignored the tiny little voice that whispered, "Don't you think a wind-up alarm clock would waste less electricity?" Somewhere inside me, I figured, was a sleepy person who knew perfectly well that sooner or later (probably sooner) I would forget to wind such a clock.

I got into the shower for my usual post wake-up nap, which I like to take while leaning on the wall of the shower with water running all over me (I don't use Coast — I can't even imagine acting like the people on those commercials in the morning, and I don't want to be brought back to life). Instead, a voice whispered, "You're wasting water." My roommates have been trying for months to convince me that I'm wasting hot water. They don't seem to be concerned about the cold. I don't suspect any of them of hiding in the bathroom and spying at the time. I also don't think their motives are environmental.

Having finished my shower in record time, I actually had time for breakfast (I almost called my mom to let her know). Pouring Rice Krispies out of the box prompted my new friend to inform me that, "Malt O' Meal sells that same cereal in bags." The voice was beginning to sound familiar. As the last drops of milk trickled into the bowl it said, "Dillon's recycles those bottles."

I was beginning to feel like a character from "Field of Dreams." "Listen, voice," I said, "Cut it out. I don't even want to know who will come if I build a recycling center out of recycled aluminum. Not interested. I just want to live a normal, convenience-filled life." So saying, I carefully stowed the milk

Karin
Dell'Antonia
Collegian Columnist

gallon next to the trash can. It was obvious which of us was in control.

It was no use. The voice followed me all day. It dragged me all over campus after my first class searching for a place to put my Pepsi can where they would recycle it. I tried to get away with claiming that if I left my Collegian on the floor, someone else would read it, which was a lot like recycling only easier. The voice didn't buy that, so after a fruitless search for a recycling bin all over campus, I finally took the damn thing home to start my own pile. My roommates were thrilled.

The voice didn't stop there. It followed me to the grocery store, where it tried to convince me to invest in one of those nifty net bags that you can buy and reuse. Knowing that I would never manage to remember to bring that back to the store, we compromised. I got plastic bags instead of paper and started yet another recycling pile. Again, my roommates were thrilled.

The voice and I had an argument when it came to the emptying of the mayonnaise jar. It went back and forth between garbage and yet another recycling pile (it could have gone right next to the empty milk gallons) for a full 15 minutes. I had to draw the line. One can only expect so much environmental reform in one day, just as one can only expect one's roommates to put up with walking around so many piles. Besides, I wouldn't have the foggiest idea where to take old glass. I could melt it down myself, I guess, and go in for new art forms, but I confess that the idea doesn't really excite me.

So now that I'm a recycler, I thought I'd better buy some consumer products to make my job easier. (Isn't there a paradox in there somewhere?). I was overwhelmed by the plethora of offerings by various "green" firms. You can buy plastic bins that stack and come with neat labels, a newspaper holder you can put twine in which makes it easier for you to tie newspapers up and a big trashcan with a special hole in the top that only cans will fit through. (Why not cut your own? It's kind of like buying pre-ripped jeans). You can also get a whole row of huge trashcans that tell you what to drop in which can (how you're supposed to get the cans to the recycling center when you have enough to fill them I don't know — not to mention how to live with the smell of the milk cartons in the meantime). You can also buy a doohickey to crush the cans and a thingamajig to squash the bottles (they're not the same, for some reason). The possibilities are endless.

We settled for a nice row of paper bags from the grocery store. (Doesn't everyone save those, tucked in between the cabinet and the wall or the refrigerator? We do, but we never seem to use them again. It's a pack rat kind of thing.)

My voice hasn't gotten any quieter. Right now, it's involved in trying to convince me to buy recycled toilet paper. I'm dreading the day I have kids for yet another reason now, because the voice has already told me how it feels about disposable diapers. I'd probably have given in about the paper towels and stuff by now, but they cost more. Apparently saving the world is an expensive prospect.

I guess it's worth it. I for one don't want to live in a giant overheated garbage dump, and I'm willing to give up my aerosol hairspray and endure a little inconvenience in exchange for the ability to drink relatively clean water. I'm not quite a member of SAVE yet, but I'm all in favor of what they do. (I just don't want to go to additional meetings every week. I'm not that in favor of inconvenience.)

Anyway, I'm trying. We should all try. So start by figuring out a way to recycle this Collegian. Soon you'll have a little voice of your own.

UPC continues to bring entertainment to campus

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

The Union Program Council, located on the third floor of the K-State Union, works to bring entertainment as well as educational and cultural programs to the University community.

"The Union Program Council has been in existence since 1956—when the Union started," said M. Brent Stockwell, UPC president. "Activities programming, which is what we do, has been part of the Union that whole time."

In 1957, UPC had three officers and 11 committees—including hospitality, harmonizers and games, said Mike Penner, UPC acting program director.

"I think that sometime in the early 1970s the council was set up pretty much the same way it is now," he said.

This year there are about 150 student volunteers divided among the nine committees: Eclectic Entertainment, Feature Films, Special Events, Arts, Kaleidoscope, Issues and Ideas, Outdoor Recreation, Travel and Promotions.

Stockwell said UPC also has an executive committee, consisting of the president and the nine committee chairpersons, that provides leadership for the entire council.

UPC is considered part of Institutional Advancement and receives its funding from the operations budget of the Union, Stockwell said.

For this fiscal year, UPC has an operating budget of about $170,000, he said, but that amount isn't as much as it sounds because UPC spends about 10 percent of that on advertising and loses money on some events for which UPC does not charge admission, such as the art gallery.

UPC offers students activities other than studying.

—Jeni Cardin

UPC temporary program adviser

Penner said UPC generates about $150,000 each year and receives a little more than $17,000 from the Union.

The council is affiliated with the National Association of Campus Activities, which has member schools across the country and helps UPC bring the best performers to the area at the least cost, he said.

For example, comedian Bertice Berry will be at Forum Hall on March 25 and will also perform at Emporia on March 27 and at Wichita on March 28, Penner said.

Jeni Cardin, UPC temporary program adviser and former president of Student Union Activities at KU, said, "I have been really impressed since I got here because it is a really strong, well-structured program."

"UPC offers students activities other than studying," Cardin said. "We also try to provide educational- and informational-type activities as well."

"The students don't get paid. They are all volunteering their time, but yet they will put in many hours and hard work to bring entertainment and educational programs to fellow students," she said.

Cardin said this takes tremendous dedication but provides students with hands-on experience. Students are responsible for booking acts, contacting agents, setting dates and doing promotions, Stockwell said. The advisers, however, take care of contracts and other technical aspects.

UPC will hold a membership drive Feb. 18 to March 8, he said. Applications will be available in the UPC office, and everyone is invited to apply.

Applicants are interviewed by both new and old committee chairpersons, Stockwell said, and the process is quite selective.

UPC looks for applicants who are highly motivated, have potential leadership ability and are willing to commit to a weekly meeting, he said.

The council especially encourages freshman and sophomores to apply since UPC provides an opportunity to move up through the organization, Stockwell said, but no one is excluded from applying.

'L.A. Story' big on laughs

Martin's screenplay juggles modern romance, fantasy life

ERIC MELIN
Collegian Reviewer

There aren't many major movies that have come out recently in wide release that can really make an audience laugh. "L.A. Story" tries to be a modern love tale, a celebration of life in Los Angeles and a comedy. It's more of an indictment than a celebration, the romance is pretty weak, but this is a funny film.

Steve Martin plays Harris Telemacher, a wacky weatherman for KYOY-TV. A member of the L.A. jet-set, he "does lunch" with people he doesn't know and is stuck with a girlfriend (Marilyn Henner) he doesn't like. The screenplay, written by Martin, then takes a turn into fantasy.

One day Harris' car breaks down in front of a freeway sign when he notices it is talking directly to him. The digital readout tells Harris that many changes will soon occur in his life and the weather will be the cause of them. It proves to be true when he breaks up with his girlfriend and loses his job. He then meets Sara McDowell (Victoria Tennant), a British journalist, and decides to pursue a relationship with her.

At its best, "L.A. Story" is a damning look at trendy, fake socialites and the general outlook on life that the residents have. At its worst, it's an unoriginal, lukewarm romance. The plot is pretty predictable, but the witty one-liners and sarcastic observations sustain the movie and keep it from becoming boring. When Harris finds his girlfriend has been cheating on him for the past three years, he says, "This has been going on since the eighties?"

Reviewer says ...

"Funnier than the word mugwumps"

Sarah Jessica Parker steals many of the comic moments as Sandee, a bouncy clothing store clerk who's constantly bobbing from her weekly enemas. She personifies L.A.'s hip young crowd, while coming across with a charming innocence that still makes her likable.

Martin's script takes off on wild tangents every so often and turns to total hilarity. When told that the first day of spring is upon him, Harris declares open season on the highway and scrambles for a revolver. Soon everyone on the road is shooting at each other. Total reality breaks like these are the high points of the movie.

Rick Moranis cameos as a gravedigger in a scene that parallels "Hamlet," and the freeway sign also seems to be well-versed in Shakespeare. Maybe this was more important in the original script, but in the final edit it serves only to confuse things more.

This is English director Mick Jackson's second American movie. By using bright, contrasting colors and using unconventional camera techniques, he makes L.A. come alive. He is also responsible for the two worst scenes in the film. As Sara and Harris become separated, he offers the viewer two pace-breaking montages set to sensitive music as the two lovers think about their situation.

It's when "L.A. Story" goes from outrageous parody to an air of believability that it gets mixed up. But, thanks to Martin, there are enough funny bits to keep an audience's interest throughout the movie.

principal-counselor-student

The Office of Admissions cordially invites former students of these high schools to attend the 1991 Principal-Counselor-Student Conference. High school principals and counselors will be on campus to visit with you about your preparation for and experiences in KSU academic programs. Your participation will help the University build a stronger relationship with your former high school faculty. You are welcome to drop by between 10:15 a.m. and 12:15 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 21. This is an excellent opportunity for you to renew old friendships with former classmates. The Provost has asked that your instructors excuse you from these class periods.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Final III system top notch

JENIFER SCHEIBLER
Sports Reporter

It's a statistician's dream. The Final III basketball statistics package used by the K-State's men's and women's basketball teams can do it all.

Every bit of statistical information pertinent to a basketball game and needed by the coaches and media is produced by this program, Bob Swenson, president of Manhattan Data Systems Inc., said.

The package, an $18,000 gift to K-State from Manhattan Data Systems Inc., provides box scores, game statistics, play-by-play and several analytical reports via a three-computer system.

"The series of three computers interact with each other to produce the needed information," Swenson said.

The series includes a control computer that communicates to the shot computer and media monitors, he said.

All information, such as player names and numbers, is entered into the control computer prior to the game and then used to record the play-by-play once the game begins, he said.

The control computer screen consists of boxed player numbers and events used to record the game's play-by-play. This is done when the control computer operator uses a light pen to touch the screen on the appropriate player's number box and then the corresponding event box. For example, if Joe Blow, number 45, grabs a defensive rebound, the control computer operator will touch the screen above the number 45 box and then touch the screen above the defensive rebound box.

The event screen provides boxes for every game event possible and also records lineup changes.

A spotter, one for each team, sits on either side of the control computer operator to call the game's events.

While the control computer operator is recording the play-by-play, the shot computer operator is recording the shot information. This consists of using a pen light to place a dot on the screen corresponding to the position from which the shot went up.

Simultaneously the information recorded by the control computer operator continually updates the game statistics on the screens of the media monitors.

The role of the media monitors is to provide information for the radio and TV networks broadcasting the game. A member of the sports information department staff oversees a media monitor screen located next to the rest of the system and enters additional information that may be of interest to the media announcers.

This information may include an interesting game statistic or an update of another game score being played at the same time, and is displayed across the bottom of the media monitors located near the media broadcasters.

The system then prepares selected information to be printed and distributed to the coaches at halftime and to the media at the completion of the game.

Swenson said it takes a crew of five at minimum to run the system during the games.

During the season, the system is used by the sports information department to keep a complete statistical update of both career and season information for the individual players and team, he said.

The Final III system is capable of producing such highly specialized reports in the form of shot information that includes distance, court area and type of shot taken, player combination offensive and defensive effectiveness and a turnover analysis.

These reports all can be used to measure team performance and improve execution.

Swenson said the shooting analysis can break down a player's shots into areas of the court where the shots were taken. This, in turn, can determine the player's effectiveness from different areas.

Reports such as a shooting report can specify certain areas of strength or weakness a player or team has.

"A coach can see in what area a player or team needs work in," Swenson said.

The system, used also used by Big Eight teams Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma, is currently the statistical package chosen to be used in the Final Four, Kenny Mossman, K-State sports information director, said.

The system has been used at K-State for three years.

Football assistant coach visiting USC

K-State associate head coach Bob Cope is considered the leading candidate for the position of defensive secondary coach at the University of Southern California. He could take the job as early as today.

TODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

K-State football assistant coach Bob Cope is currently visiting the University of Southern California and could be named the Trojans' defensive secondary coach as early as this afternoon.

Cope was reached in California late Monday night, but deferred comment until today.

The Wildcats' associate head coach and defensive coordinator, Cope, has been visiting USC for several days and isn't expected to return to Manhattan until late this week, a representative of USC sports information said Monday.

Meanwhile, a source close to the K-State athletic department said that department officials have begun the process of inquiring as to affirmative action requirements in the event Cope should leave. It is believed that Cope's replacement could be hired from within.

No formal announcement of Cope's visit has been made to the Trojan sports information department, said Steven Vanderpool, USC's assistant sports information director. The football office reported that all members of the Trojan coaching staff, including head coach Larry Smith, were on vacation and were unavailable for comment.

Smith generally contacts the sports information department several days prior to any staff hirings so that the bureau can assemble information for a formal press release. No contact had been made as of Monday, Vanderpool said.

"The coaches just finished with recruiting and are taking a week off, so (Smith) had no time to reach any kind of decision," Vanderpool said. "I know that he had no timetable for naming a replacement and that there was no urgency to find someone quickly."

That, however, may change today.

USC's former secondary coach, Bob April, left in mid-January to take a similar position at Ohio State, Vanderpool said.

A return to secondary coaching would appear logical for Cope, who served in a similar position at the University of Arkansas.

Cope has served as an assistant at Vanderbilt, Pacific, Southern Methodist, Arkansas, Mississippi and Purdue in addition to K-State. He was head coach at Pacific from 1983-88.

Vanderpool was unsure of Cope's connection to Smith and the USC program. He said a connection resulting from Cope's stints at Pacific was unlikely.

Cope, named the top assistant in the Big Eight by the Sporting News prior to the 1990 season, helped direct the K-State team to one of its best seasons in history last fall.

He built a defense that began to assert itself as a force in the conference. The 4,471 yards that the Wildcats allowed marked the fewest allowed since 1985.

A defense that for years yielded big totals to powerful rushing offenses like Oklahoma and Nebraska, the Wildcats surrendered its least number of yards on the ground since 1982. The team's 35 takeaways ranks as the school's fourth best total in history.

Hazim's play improves

Guard Nadira Hazim fights to keep the ball against Missouri earlier this season. Named Big Eight Player-of-the-Week twice, Hazim is averaging 22 points per game.

Guard raises effort to new level

BILL LANG
Sports Reporter

It's not quite a dream come true, but she's enjoying living it nonetheless.

Nadira Hazim entered her senior season as a Lady Cat not knowing what to expect. After all, her team had just missed tying for league crown last season. It also just missed winning the Big Eight Postseason Tournament title.

In league play last season, Hazim averaged 15.6 points per contest. To say that she's lifted that level of play in 1990-91 is an understatement. This year she is averaging 22.7 points, and she's added an average of 6.1 rebounds a contest.

"I'm not sure how to explain it," Hazim said of her success. "I think that I've just dug a little deeper. If we want to win the Big Eight, we're going to have to play a little bit harder."

Hazim was known to have enough talent when she came out of high school in Topeka, but as for a year like this, it sort of came by surprise.

"Well, I didn't really expect this. I just wanted to play good because it's my last year, and things started happening."

"I think that a lot of things are coming my way, and that's what's been happening lately," Hazim added. "We have a lot of weapons and that opens the court for me a little more."

Hazim attributes a lot of her success to the quickness she possesses.

"It helps create a lot of opportunities for me offensively," she said. "Actually, it helps on both ends of the floor and creates a lot of problems for the other team."

Hazim said it's the new system which Lady Cat coach Susan Yow brought with her that has helped the most.

"I had to change a lot of things that I learned from previous coaches," Hazim said. "She's a good coach and she really knows her stuff. The thing she helped me with the most was my defense. She came in and taught us a whole new mentality about defense."

That mentality has resulted in Hazim stealing the ball 21 times in Big Eight play.

For Yow, the play of Hazim has really come as no big surprise.

"I think we've seen her do it all season long in practice," she said. "She's doing it out of our system. It's really helped that she's getting it out of our system, but it would be nice if everybody was scoring like that out of our system."

As for the team's fortunes, Hazim said she hopes they can only improve.

"We've had a big let-down as of late," she said. "Kansas beat us right before the end of the season last year. Then we lost to Oklahoma State in the (Big Eight) tournament finals and that has really motivated us to do better this year. We just want to prove that we can beat them."

As for now, Hazim and the Lady Cats are taking it one day at a time.

"O-State (Feb. 20) is going to be a tough game and we'll have to be up for it," Hazim said. "Right now, though, Colorado is coming into town and we have to get ready for that."

Mississippi State enters Top 25 poll; KU moves to 11th

By the Associated Press

STARKVILLE, Miss. — When Richard Williams took over the Mississippi State program five years ago, his goal was simply to make his alma mater competitive.

On Monday, his Bulldogs made the Associated Press poll for the first time in 12 years, moving into the rankings at No. 23.

Mississippi State (15-6), picked as low as seventh in the SEC, knocked off No. 16 Kentucky 83-82 Saturday to hit the Top 25 for the first time since a No. 18 ranking in January 1979.

"You can't minimize what the ranking means to our program, it has been a long time," Williams said. "It means a lot and gives us some kind of identity."

UNLV was a unanimous choice as the top team in the poll for the fourth time in five weeks. The Runnin' Rebels, who whipped Arkansas, last week's runner-up, 112-105 Sunday to improve to 20-0. UNLV was picked No. 1 by all 63 votes in the nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters. It's the 12th straight week that UNLV, the only unbeaten major college team in the nation, has been in the top spot.

Ohio State (19-1), which blasted Northwestern in its only game last week, climbed over Arkansas into the No. 2 spot. Arkansas (23-2) dropped back to third place, followed by Indiana (22-2) and Duke (21-4), which climbed from sixth to fifth after whipping two top-25 teams, Virginia and LSU, as well as Maryland.

Williams points out that Mississippi State's credentials include more than just beating Kentucky.

Mississippi State has won five of its last six SEC games and is in second place in the conference at 8-4, trailing only Alabama (15-6 and 9-3). The Bulldogs, which posted a 16-14 overall record and an NIT appearance last season, are also assured of its first back-to-back winning campaigns since 1977-78 and 1978-79.

Arizona (19-4), which lost to Southern Cal before Sunday's 105-94 overtime victory at UCLA, dropped from fifth to sixth. Syracuse, North Carolina, Southern Mississippi and East Tennessee State rounded out the Top 10.

Kansas, which knocked off a pair of ranked opponents last week, made the biggest move, climbing from 18th to 11th. The Jayhawks were followed by New Mexico State, St. John's, Utah, UCLA, Kentucky, Nebraska, Georgetown, Virginia and LSU.

Oklahoma State was 21st, followed by Pitt.

Buckeyes down Michigan

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) — Jim Jackson scored 21 points and reserve Chris Jent sparked the Buckeyes with 14 points as No. 2 Ohio State improved to 20-1 with an 81-65 Big Ten victory over Michigan on Monday night.

Ohio State, which won the first meeting between the teams 67-57 in Ann Arbor, won for the 15th straight time at home. The Buckeyes are 12-0 at St. John Arena this season.

Mark Baker added 14 points, Treg Lee had 13 and Perry Carter scored 11 points to go with 12 rebounds for the Buckeyes, who moved into a tie with Indiana for the Big Ten lead with a record of 10-1.

Michael Talley scored 21 points and Demetrius Calip had 14 for Michigan, 11-10 overall and 4-7 in the Big Ten.

Jayhawks to face Missouri

By the Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Missouri, trying to hang together despite a spate of injuries and setbacks, hosts No. 11 Kansas in what could be the biggest obstacle standing between the Jayhawks and the Big Eight championship.

An eight-game winning streak has vaulted Roy Williams' Jayhawks to 17-4 overall and 6-2 in the Big Eight, one game better than the 5-3 Nebraska Cornhuskers, Oklahoma State Cowboys and Missouri Tigers.

Missouri, struggling without guard Anthony Peeler for much of the year and with freshman Jevon Crudup probably out for the year, stands at 13-7 overall.

Peeler, who has been nursing a leg injury, may not be ready for the 6:30 tipoff Tuesday.

Although the Tigers are in contention for the Big Eight title, they are barred by NCAA probation from the NCAA Tournament.

Last month in Lawrence, the Jayhawks handed the Tigers a 91-64 licking.

It's hard to say goodbye to your heroes

Eric Brown

Sports Reporter

This summer, when I return to see my first love, I'll find that she's not the girl I used to know, and the shock of the news will break my heart.

In past experiences such as this, I was not alone in my zest. On the contrary, I shared it with thousands, and for this reason it's been termed "America's Pastime." I lived for baseball, and the Kansas City Royals were the center of my affections.

Sadly enough, this year the Royals will remind me of several of the other franchises — maybe even a McDonald's.

Any of you who've ever eaten out of town understand the correlation. Go into one place with the Golden Arches out front and you've been in them all. However, they're just not the same as the one back home.

I realize out at the Truman Sports Complex this year you'll be paying the same parking prices, maybe more. They'll still have that neat scoreboard and waterfall, and the organist will still lure the home team into rally-killing strikeouts with that charge tune.

I'll start to think it's still like those glory days that all Midwestern "boys of summer" cherish. I'll look out across the diamond for a glimpse of a routine McDouble play.

But wait, where's that friendly girl that would always give out lots of extra ketchup and handfuls of game pieces? The uniform is the same, but there's a stranger greeting me. "Hi! Welcome to McDonald's! Can I take your order?"

That's not all. There's an unfamiliar fry-guy manning centerfield. Gee, I sure wish I was back home where the whopper flopper recognizes my face and knows what I'm going to get the second I walk inside.

When the "fantastic four" — George Brett, Frank White, Willie Wilson and Dan Quisenberry — signed lifetime contracts almost a decade ago, fans believed they would always dawn the royal blue each spring, as guardians of time.

No one noticed that, as years went by and youngsters like myself started growing older, they, too, were aging.

Two new names have recently been added to the list of departed Royal legends. But this time, the heart of the team is being ripped away.

I'm not too worried that others will step up and become the new leaders. It's just that deep down, it seemed as if the cursive writing on the front of the jerseys subliminally spelled "Frank White" as well as "Royals."

In addition, the overlapping "KC" on the hats beckoned out "Willie Wilson."

It's Frank's and Willie's experience and familiar faces that will be sorely missed in the 1990s, if not in the team's record, at least by all Royals followers.

White

Change is inevitable, but hard to except. I can't see Willie Wilson, the guru of the inside-the-park homer, wearing an A's uniform. My heart won't let me believe that I'll never see Frank roam into the hole to make a sensational diving play.

Professional athletics have total personnel turnover, just like college teams, only with longer time spans. This is easy to see as teams like the New York Yankees, although hated all along, have outlived the automobile and endured more changes.

But the Royals are infants when compared to those older teams, and inevitably they are completing their first transition in team history. Unlike other organizations, Kansas City has no past legends shined in Cooperstown or the Royals' Hall-of-Fame. The few Royals Hall-of-Famers were teammates of White and Wilson, not forerunners of them.

The only tradition and history the Royals have was created by those teams of the late 1970s and 1980s. Not one championship banner would fly in Royals Stadium if it were not for the presence of Frank White and Willie Wilson.

It's a dreary day along I-70 when a longstanding courtship comes to an end, not to mention two courtships at once. The thought of those guys cleaning out their lockers causes an emptiness that will be equalled only when No. 5 hangs up his cleats. George Brett is the "Last of the Mohicans."

White and Wilson packing their bags only further saddens us because of the terms in which they are parting from the club they stabilized for nearly two decades.

Two players who've contributed so much to Kansas City should be knighted rather than run out of town on a rail. The Royals have been known for taking care of their players, but after repeated conflicts that image has done an about-face.

But this column isn't to second guess the front office decision, which seems to have been made after a long night on the town. It's written to toast two very deserving stars.

I've yet to come up with a way to replace Nos. 6 and 20. My parents, although equally sentimental, wouldn't adhere to Kevin Costner's "Field of Dreams" approach of digging up the backyard and adding a ball diamond.

I also doubt that "if I build it, he will come." Every kid who grew up with a ball glove in his hand was truly gripped by the emotions conjured up by that movie, but now I see the internal conflict caused when one's idols fade away.

I don't doubt the talents of Terry Shumpert and Brian McRae, but saying goodbye to the dreams you shared and breaking those ties with that first love is never a cheery experience. Frank White and Willie Wilson will not soon be forgotten for their numerous achievements.

It'll be harder for me to let White and Wilson go than it was for then-Royals GM John Schuerholz and new boss Herk Robinson.

by Vice President Dan Quayle, Secretary of State James Baker III, Brent Scowcroft, the national security adviser, and John Sununu, the president's chief of staff.

"The air campaign has been very, very effective and it will continue for awhile," Bush announced afterward. "We're not talking about dates for further adding to the air campaign, put it that way."

Citing the safety of allied troops, Bush said there would not be a public discussion of when a ground war might begin.

He said he would rely heavily on advice from Cheney, Powell and others. "And then if they come to me and say there needs to be another phase, then I will then make that decision because that is a decision for the president of the United States."

"Having said that," Bush added, "I have total confidence we are on the right path."

"I would be remiss if I didn't reassure the American people this war is being fought with high technology," the president said. "There is no targeting of civilians."

"It has gone far better in terms of casualties than I had hoped, but we mourn the loss of every single member of our armed forces and the coalition forces, of course," he said.

Rookie female cop killed while on duty

By the Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — A rookie policewoman caught in a shootout Monday became the first female Los Angeles police officer killed in the line of duty.

Officer Tina Kerbrat, 34, a mother of two who had been on the police force just 10 months, was shot in the head in a patrol car as she stopped to question two men sitting on a sidewalk drinking beer, police said.

She was the fifth police officer to be shot this week, said Lt. William Hall. The others survived.

Kerbrat's partner, 20-year veteran Earl Valladares, returned fire and killed a gunman, identified as Jose Amaya, 32, an illegal immigrant from El Salvador.

"There's been a lot of talk about women in combat these days," police Chief Daryl F. Gates said during a profanity-laced news conference. "The Los Angeles Police Department's women are in combat all the time."

"If you think the war is just in the Persian Gulf, you are wrong. Our casualties are greater in proportion to the casualties in the Persian Gulf. We should wonder where in the world we are going. What kind of city do we have here? What kind of monsters do we have here?"

Before the officers got out of the patrol car, one of the men pulled out a

.357 Magnum and opened fire, investigators said. Kerbrat died in surgery at Pacifica Hospital. Valladares, 45, was not wounded.

The other beer-drinker, James Welch, 24, was being held for violating parole on a cocaine conviction. Welch was a known member of a San Fernando Valley street gang that was responsible for the death of an officer in 1988, Gates said.

The police chief condemned lax federal immigration regulations for the suspected gunman's presence in this country.

"It is clearly a failure of our immigration service which does not pay attention to those who shouldn't be here," said Gates.

Ben Davidian, western regional commissioner for the Immigration and Naturalization Service in Los Angeles, said he wasn't fully familiar with Amaya's case but that Amaya had been turned down for political asylum.

A deportation order was issued, but Amaya was able to stay in the United States under provisions of immigration and case law, Davidian said.

"We could not remove this man under the law," Davidian said, adding he was "at a loss to understand where the failing was that Chief Gates was referring to."

Kelly

After that, when he needed to hide, he would do so in an attic crawl space. One day he did not have enough time to get into the crawl space, and the Iraqi soldiers found and searched it, but they did not find Kelly in his alternate hiding space.

During his period of hiding, Kelly's family tried contacting him by using the Voice of America radio network. Families could call a 1-900 number and leave a 30-second message for their loved ones in Kuwait.

Monica Kelly's family would call and leave messages four or five times a week, but her father only heard three of the messages the whole time he was there.

Kelly said he tried contacting his family by sending letters, no matter how dangerous it was.

"In retrospect, it was probably foolhardy to do so," he said.

The letters had to be taken out of Kuwait by friends who were able to move out of Kuwait freely, yet only half of the letters he sent were received by his family.

"Basically they were a day-to-day account of what he had been through. He would initialize people's names and use code names for certain places," said Monica Kelly of the letters.

Even though he could not talk to his family by phone, Kelly said he could call friends in the other buildings by using a signal they had devised.

"We would let the phone ring three times and then hang up, then let it ring again," he said.

This assured others it was a friendly call, because the Iraqis would call people looking for Westerners to answer.

Then on Dec. 6, Saddam Hussein announced he was allowing all hostages to leave Kuwait. It wasn't until Dec. 8 — when it was confirmed the announcement included those in hiding — that Kelly knew he would be leaving Kuwait.

He finally made it back to the United States Dec. 10. Monica Kelly saw him the next day when he arrived home in Kansas City.

Both father and daughter said they were supportive of the war when it broke out in January.

Monica Kelly said she was glad the United States entered Iraq because she didn't really believe the sanctions would work.

"I think it's good we're going over there and doing this — it saves face," she said.

Stephen Kelly said the gulf war was the first time he felt strongly about U.S. involvement in a war since World War II.

"I am very supportive of our country's stance, and very supportive of President Bush's stance," he said.

Both said Hussein needs to be stopped, or he will try to take over more countries in the gulf. Kelly said he saw some similarities between Hussein and Adolph Hitler.

"There are many parallels between the two men. Both ran police states; both attacked smaller countries; both were repressive of the minority population, and both had very strong expansionist desires," he said.

Monica Kelly said she enjoyed living in Kuwait from 1984-87, when it was peaceful.

"It gave me an opportunity to see the world," she said.

As for returning to Kuwait when the war is over, Stephen Kelly said he has not decided against it.

"I might welcome that," he said of a return visit. "There is certainly going to be a lot of work for engineers and architects over there when this is over."

Scientists search sky for cloud

By the Associated Press

DETROIT — Scientists worldwide searched the skies late Monday for a red cloud the size of a full moon after a lithium canister was released to study the Earth's magnetic field.

"This release is to try and inject an artificial lithium plasma cloud to see if we can increase precipitation," Rick Howard, spokesman for the project stationed in Marquette, said.

The release from a satellite, known as CRRES for Combined Release and Radiation Effects Satellite, occurred about 11:15 p.m., Howard said.

Scientists on the ground in New Mexico, Maryland, St. Croix and Chile observed the release along with others in a plane above Canada, he said.

Howard said the cloud, visible for less than two minutes, was much dimmer than a full moon.

take them off the air or they would have a cease-and-desist order issued."

Montgomery said he was going to look further into the legality of the spoof, but he didn't want to spend any money doing it. He also said he only made the spot to be funny and didn't really expect it to offend the other stations.

"KMKF seems paranoid about us stealing ideas — most other stations don't really pay attention," he said. "There's a lot of stuff that goes on the air and you don't get cleared. We're not a commercial station competing for advertising dollars, so I don't really think it's offensive."

To further complicate matters KSDB music and program director Jim Johnson on Friday was fired from his part-time announcing job at KMAN-AM, KMKF's sister station. He said he called to find out when he was supposed to work, and he was told he was no longer on the schedule.

"It was pretty cold the way they did it," Johnson said. "I think they think I stole the sweepster, but I didn't. I had nothing to do with the concept or the creation. I asked the general manager at KMKF why I was fired, and he just beat around the bush."

Whisnand said Johnson was taken off the air on KMKF several weeks ago, and KMAN had to cut back on airshifts due to a new automation system. After evaluating the staff Whisnand and music director Monty Pyle made the decision to let Johnson go.

Johnson said he is not bitter about his dismissal and thinks the whole situation is funny. He also said he is planning to get legal advice and possibly file a wrongful dismissal suit in small claims court.

But Whisnand said Johnson's dismissal and the sweepster incident are completely unrelated, and he said he had no idea as to how KSDB got the sweepster.

"I don't think they just left a tape running and caught it when it played," Whisnand said. "It hadn't even been on the air for two weeks prior to the time I heard it on KSDB. But I have no proof that J.J. (Jim Johnson) took it from the station and recorded it."

Whisnand said Johnson was repeatedly late for work at KMKF and KMAN and had been on probation.

"There is no question of discrimination," he said of Johnson's dismissal. "It's just a matter of keeping your best people on the air."

Though the two incidents have no correlation, Whisnand said he did contact Montgomery and told him to stop playing the sweepster.

"KMKF has market exclusivity on Mark Driscoll's voice," Whisnand said. "KSDB cannot use it without giving credit. That's why when television stations play other networks' news footage they have to say on the screen 'Film courtesy of ABC News' or something like that."

The exclusivity of the idea for the sweepster is still in question because Whisnand said he got took concept for it from Wichita's KICT-FM. But swiping the idea and taking the actual product are two different things, Whisnand said.

KJCK program director James Phelps said he has not talked to Montgomery, but he said he had to actually hear KSDB playing the sweepster before his station would do anything.

"We have to catch them doing playing it on the air and record it," Phelps said. "In layman's terms what they're doing is illegal. Those are copyrighted and — if stolen and played — KSDB can be prosecuted."

But Phelps said he hoped to avoid that.

"I hate to go through all the red tape when it could be handled on a more personal level," he said. "But I'll have to say it shows a weak attitude toward the business. They really should be more creative and come up with something of their own."

"But when you're No. 1 people are going to want to follow in your footsteps," Phelps said.

Historian to be featured tonight

African tradition topic of lecture

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

Historian Bruce Bridges of Durham, N.C., will speak tonight at 7:30 in the Union Little Theatre as part of Black History Month. His lecture is "African-American Contributions to World Civilizations."

Bridges, who is the host of Cultural Awareness Seminar, a very popular radio talk show in North Carolina, will talk about how many of the contributions and traditions that came out of Africa have been written out of history, said Anne Butler, director of education supportive services and director of Ebony Theater, a black student theatrical group.

"He reminds us how history has excluded the contributions of African-Americans to the culture we're comfortable with today," Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, said.

He said he does it in a fun, interesting, informative and factual way.

"Bridges is aware of the intellectual traditions of both Africans and African-Americans," Butler said. "It goes way back to how math and sciences came out of Africa and how Greek philosophers borrowed heavily from scholarship that has its origins in Egypt."

She said the scholarship became known as Greek philosophy having originated in Greece and Europe, but they really originated in Egypt.

Bridges will be giving a lot of factual information that is not generally known, Butler said.

Franklin said Bridges uses examples, such as the contributions blacks made during the foundation of our country. History has taught us the role of blacks at that time was as slaves, when in fact there were smart, interesting blacks who had an impact on history. Standard history only tells of slavery.

Franklin said he met Bridges a few years ago at a National Association for Campus Activities conference, where Bridges was one of the lecturers.

"Several thousand people enjoyed him," Franklin said. "He had a real impact."

Club earns profit from extra flour

Students sell by-products of milling class research

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

K-State's flour mill in the Department of Grain Science and Industry has been teaching milling classes for 30 years. It did not, however, always produce surpluses in class.

Weekly flour sales started in the early 1970s, Walter Eustace, professor of grain science and industry, said.

The flours are by-products from research that are sold to the public, he said.

The department started selling flour several years ago, but about 10 years ago the K-State Grain Science Club took over the flour sales, said Eustace, adviser of the club.

Every Wednesday and Friday, between 15 and 20 club members are busy bagging up the flour they will sell the following Wednesday.

"More than once a week would probably not be worth it," Luke Burger, president of the Grain Science Club, said.

Between 1,000 and 1,500 pounds of flour are sold every week. But it varies with the seasons, he said.

"About 50 to 100 people are coming in on a good day," he said. "We can't keep up with it in the fall. Also, our Christmas pack sells."

"Spring slows down — it warms up and people don't want to bake their own bread then," he said.

The best customers are local high schools and the University, Eustace said.

Douglas Hull, senior in milling science and management and production manager of the Bakery Club, said the Bakery Club also uses a little for its own products.

"The hard, red winter wheat they use in class cannot be used for all our baking products, some require soft wheat," Hull said.

The mill yields 325 hundred pounds of flour in 24 hours, Burger said.

Between 1957 and 1961, milling students could only learn from field trips to Salina, Topeka or Abilene. A fire in the Department of Agronomy in August 1957 destroyed the first mill from 1913, which was a wood mill. It took four years until the new concrete-steel mill was installed in Shellenberger Hall, Eustace said.

The grain to make the flour comes from local farmers and co-ops, Mike King, flour sales chairman of the Grain Science Club, said.

Whole wheat and white flours are the best sellers, Jeff Pitts, another flour sales chairman, said.

The flours cost between $1.20 and $2.25 per pack of five pounds. Wheat bran and germ, farina and bulgur are available at 25 cents to 75 cents per pound.

The Grain Science Club makes about $25 to $35 per week after paying for the bags, grain and electricity. This money is used to support other activities of the club, Burger said.

The club was founded in the early 70s to give students a chance to get together. The 85 club members organize picnics, field trips and lectures with representatives from industry, Burger said.

Cathy Slobodnik said she drives 20 miles from Belvue every three months to buy flour from the club, because she can get wheat flour in larger quantities than if she bought it in a store.

Sandy Hettenbach, freshman in bakery science and management, said she buys flour every other month, mostly to support the University and the milling science program.

Flour sales are every Wednesday between noon and 4 p.m. in Shellenberger 220.

Students view other cultures

By the Collegian Staff

Students who travel abroad to study have the opportunity to experience academics as well as other cultures.

One program — Semester at Sea — lets a student go on a world cruise while studying.

"The Semester at Sea program provides a different angle for Americans," Alison Rich, senior in communities pre-law, said.

"It helps you. It's enlightening, you don't think about how different the United States is to other cultures. It makes you form your own opinions. It really helps fight prejudices," Rich said.

Students can also earn the Rhodes Scholarship, the Marshall Scholarship and the Rotary Scholarship to help finance the expenses of studying abroad. K-State has had many students receive them.

"These scholarships pay for everything, including airfare, housing, books, tuition and meals," Jerry Weis, professor of biology, said.

"The Rotary Scholarship involves three essays an application that must be filled out, reference letters, language tests and a grade point average of a 3.5 and above," Weis said.

Currently, there are three students attending K-State on the Rotary Scholarship. Two of them are from Pakistan, and one is from Guatemala.

"K-State also has two students studying abroad. The two former K-Staters are now studying in Costa Rica and England," Weis said.

"Many students study where they have a strong background in the language. Latin America, Central America and South America have a strong pull because of the Spanish background," Weis said. "However, Europe is still the most popular place to go," he said.

Rich has studied abroad several times. She has been to Australia, and is hoping to study in Costa Rica, where fluent Spanish is spoken.

"I'm hoping to study in the rain forest. I studied tropical species diversity in the rain forest while I was in Australia," said Rich. Many students may not know about these programs that are available. "We try to publish the opportunity and encourage able students to apply and give them information about the program," said Nancy Twiss, dean of the College Arts and Sciences.

"I would recommend it for anybody. It provides more than an academic experience. I've learned more in the five weeks in the rain forest, than I have my whole time here at K-State," Rich said.

TV rating system studied

Journalism professor finds problems with people meter

ULRIKE DAUER
Collegian Reporter

Future people meters will be able to determine the people watching television by size and weight. The introduction of the current people meter, a device to determine television ratings, set the whole TV judging system apart, said William Adams, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications.

Adams received one of five grants for $4,800 from the National Association of Broadcasters in 1990. Adams' study of changing programming patterns also received an NAB grant in 1982.

Adams' recent study was designed to find out how rating numbers changed with the introduction of the people meter, a new device for measuring TV show ratings.

He also wanted to know if the audience changes he found were permanent, he said.

Adams collected data about weekly primetime ratings for all programs between 1985 and 1990 and compared it before, during and after introduction of the people meter.

The introduction of the device in 1987 set the media world into turmoil because it gathered completely different results than all methods previously used. Broadcasters, advertisers and researchers suddenly had to deal with unexpectedly high audience losses.

The media was upset, because until that time, TV show ratings had been considered sacred, Adams said. Unquestioned for 30 years, they determined almost every broadcast decision regarding audience trends, desires and tastes, advertising rates and competitive strategies between 1950 and 1980.

The new people meter showed a sudden, permanent 2 percent drop in ratings, which related to 90 million homes, was equal to $400 million in lost advertising revenues, Adams said.

The new people meter allowed tracking people in detail and yielded instant demographics, he said. It reported who was watching what, where, when and how long more than any other device.

Every household member — even guests — received an identification number, Adams said. Whenever turning on the television, and consecutively every 15 minutes thereafter, this number was entered into a computer keyboard attached to the TV set. If the person left the room, the number was typed out.

Previously, a black box attached to the back of the TV set and a people diary had been the only sources of information about people and their watching attitudes, Adams said. Both measures could not tell whether someone was really watching or whether the TV set was only running.

The black box could not determine who was in the room, so the ratings recorded were usually higher, Adams said.

"The people meter broke the mythology of rating perfection. Now, nobody believes the ratings. Advertisers, companies and networks now want more proof before they change their programs," Adams said.

He said the people meter affected programming. As a result of low ratings, CBS and NBC canceled most soap operas, he said.

Programs focusing on the traditional female or older people also lost their audience.

"Trendy now were programs that had the young male appeal," Adams said.

But the new device has also created some new problems, Adams said.

"Children forget to use it, and older people don't like it," he said. It also tends to overemphasize men among the audience.

"The basic thing is that men like to play with it. It's toy," Adams said.

This semester Adams and Paul Prince, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, started a new study on video rentals.

"There's big money, but little known," Adams said.

David MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, wants to test procedures for selecting music to be played on the radio, based on listeners' reactions to the mood in the music, he said.

"Figuring audiences instead of charts, the music director would not depend on the popularity of the music," MacFarland said.

Band shows unique attitude

STACEY HARBISON
Collegian Reviewer

Southern Steel. Sounds like a country band with a hard edge to it. But the Steve Morse Band is anything but country.

The attitude that is conveyed throughout the entire album is one of bold authority. The band just seems to exude control over its music while at the same time giving it free reign.

Morse's playing, and the entire album for that matter, is definitely unique. After listening to the album, Southern Steel seems like the perfect name.

Totally instrumental, the music is at times very soft and subtle, then surges into fiery melodies that fuel the emotions.

You might call it somewhat adventurous.

One moment the sonic statements scream, and the next they purr. The

Reviewer says ...

"Not what I expected"

music definitely has an attitude all its own. The music flows naturally so it is easy to get caught up in the rhythm.

I really enjoyed the various guitar tones and styles of music portrayed. They call themselves a rock band that plays instrumentals, and that's exactly what they are.

Listening to the album leaves you with the impression that the Steve Morse Band is not holding anything back—they want to keep their music unstructured.

The distinctive guitar tones of Steve Morse mix well with Dave LaRue's surging bass lines and Van Romaine's strong drumming. Listen to Morse's own audio interpretation of "Southern Steel" on his new album and you will hear guitar strings being attacked and stroked by a master.

Morse was lead guitarist and a founding member of the Dixie Dregs (five albums and numerous live shows), and later the Dregs (four albums and more live shows.) Morse then joined Kansas for two albums and tours.

Each song of "Southern Steel" has a clear personality of its own, while blending well with all the others. Sometimes I got so caught up in the music that I didn't even realize that it was a new song.

The Steve Morse Band takes music to the limit, both technically and emotionally.

If you want to relax, sit back and take a load off, then listen to the Steve Morse Band, "Southern Steel."

Finney proposes fund elimination

ANDREW CAPPS
Collegian Reporter

Gov. Joan Finney has proposed a $8 million budget cut that would eliminate state funding to programs for gifted students.

A special committee met in the summer to discuss budgeting and school finance. The committee raised two bills concerning the gifted programs. One bill would cut funding indefinitely and the other would lift the mandate from schools but would not cut funding.

A group from the Manhattan school district, Parents for the Advancement of Gifted Education, protested the proposal. PAGE formulated a statement against removal of the mandate and removal of funding cuts.

"The funds help public facilities coordinate the school's enrichment activities," said Nancy Knopp, spokeswoman for PAGE. "It would detract from the individual education plan and enrichment activities."

Knopp said if the bill was passed the schools would not have to provide the program.

"If they are not available, gifted children and other special children can react negatively," she said. "We believe that all children's education should motivate them to meet their highest potential. The school system needs to be equipped with tools and funding to make that happen."

Sen. Lana Olen, R-Manhattan, said more than 100 people have protested the bill, and she has not yet heard from someone in favor of the plan.

Manhattan is very active concerning the issue, she said. Since the bill was proposed she has had more mail concerning the gifted program than anything else.

"Special education needs should be met, and gifted is a form of special education," Olen said.

Lois Farlin, teacher of gifted education in Manhattan, agreed.

"It's very important for students to have special services provided," she said. "I have seen the advantages the program provides."

"I have a lot of faith in our education system. We have fabulous teachers in Manhattan that can measure up to anyone," Farlin said.

Farlin meets with sixth graders and said they seem really concerned about the budget cut proposal.

Only 17 states have mandated gifted programs and Kansas was one of the first.

Roommates keep 75 different snakes in home

VICKI KNIGHT
Collegian Reporter

Every snake has its own personality.

Corey Entriiken, third-year veterinary student, and his roommate Adam Sweetman, sophomore in veterinary medicine, have the opportunity to be around about 75 such personalities each day. Entriiken and Sweetman keep the snakes in their trailer.

Entriiken and Sweetman raise and collect snakes, a hobby both of them got into at young ages.

Sweetman's father worked outdoors in the oil fields and would be around snakes all the time. Sweetman said his dad would bring them home for him. For as long as he remembers he has had pet snakes.

Entriiken said he also had snakes as a child, would meet others who also had snakes, and they would trade with each other. Entriiken said his snake collection grew pretty fast from there.

Most of the snakes Entriiken and Sweetman own are king and milk snakes. Entriiken said king snakes are about three-feet long and have different patterns. Milk snakes are tricolor—red, black and either yellow or white.

They have three burmese pythons.

One of the pythons is Mel, who is 3 feet long and 4 years old. Entriiken said Mel should get to be 17 or 18 feet long as it grows.

"The pythons eat rabbits or rats, but the other snakes eat mice, which when you have around 75 snakes you have to run your own mouse colony," Entriiken said.

The mouse colony is made up of about 100 breeder mice whose offspring are fed to the snakes.

Entriiken said snakes eat one mouse a week. They curl around the mouse and every time the mouse moves or takes a breath, the snake will squeeze tighter and tighter until the mouse dies. The mouse is then eaten head first and whole. Entriiken said that there is a lump in the snake until the mouse is digested.

"You have to be careful not to feed them too much or they will get obese on you pretty easy since they are in a cage all the time," Entriiken said.

Entriiken and Sweetman said snakes don't deserve their reputations, and that they get a bad rap. Entriiken said 95 percent of snakes are completely docile.

"A large majority of the people fear snakes and they have no reason to ... they are a part of our ecosystem and should be here ... if people would just go and see a snake they would

Institute competes for federal grants

Labor Studies Program builds relationship between society, working community

JENNIFER HOFFMAN
Collegian Reporter

In the summer of 1990, the Board of Regents approved a proposal for the development of the Institute of Social and Behavioral Research at K-State.

With the input of faculty and the dean's staff, a steering committee was formed to create a plan to bring the faculty together under common interests. The institute creates an interdisciplinary between the faculty in the social science, the behavioral science, the geography and the history departments.

This program has been successful at many other larger universities said Jack Holl, associate dean for arts and sciences. He said the goal for the institute is compete for funded grants in social behavioral by using interdisciplinary mechanisms.

"I was named the director of ISBR on Aug. 1, 1991," said Duane Nellis, professor in geography. "We've set up five focal points or programs since then."

The Geographic Information Systems/Spatial Analysis works with the Department of Argonomy and the Department of Geography. Nellis said they've already begun their project for the development of a computer-based soil information system for Kansas. The project supports four graduate assistants and about 10 undergraduates.

The Labor Studies Program builds relationships with the Kansas labor and business community, Nellis said. One of the goals is to create a stronger relationship between work and society.

The Statistical Design and Analysis Unit and the Survey Research Unit has recently completed the 1990 Kansas Rural Issues Poll. The poll was sponsored by KSU Institute for Social and Behavioral Research, KSU Agricultural Experiment Station, Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, Huck Boyd Foundation, Huck Boyd National Institute for Rural Development, Kansas Department of Commerce and KSU Department of Human Development and Family Studies.

The survey was taken of residents in the 79 counties across Kansas whose population is less than 20,000. The goal of the survey was to find out some background information of rural Kansas, said James Franke, associate professor in political science. He said the survey was successful with a high-response rate.

It provides an environment and the tools needed to do the research.

—James Franke associate professor in political science

The Advanced Research Development Program has eight research associates receiving summer money for the development of research proposals. This is for the new K-State faculty members in the social science department.

"This particular program will also provide approximately $5,000 in scholarships to the upperclass undergraduates," Nellis said. "These students will work with the faculty in the social science department. It will be like a competition where the students present their research work, and the faculty will decide who wins. It's similar to an honor thesis."

The main reason ISBR is here at K-State is to bring the faculty and the graduate students in the College of Arts and Sciences together. Without this program, there isn't much opportunity for interaction, Nellis said.

"This institute is an excellent vehicle to provide interdisciplinary and multidisciplinary structure for carrying out research," Franke said. "It provides an environment and the tools needed to do the research."

ISBR, the graduate school and the College of Arts and Sciences will be holding a conference March 4-5 at the K-State Union. The conference is aimed at the college and University faculty, research administrators, graduate students and anyone from the social and behavioral sciences who is interested in research trends in funding and grant administrations.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

Senate proposes 2 bills

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Two bills were introduced in the Senate Monday that are designed to help teen-agers stay in school and out of maternity wards.

One would finance a program to prevent teen-age pregnancies, the other would cut welfare payments to families whose children miss too much school.

Sens. Marge Petty, D-Topeka, and Wint Winter, R-Lawrence, sponsored the bill that would fund community-based education programs for those students who are likely to become teen-age parents.

Under the bill, the Department of Health and Environment would fund local community groups that would develop intervention programs for teen-agers.

Winter said they would emphasize the importance of postponing or abstaining from sex, but they would include information about birth control.

Winter said every year members of the Legislature talk about programs to prevent teen-age pregnancies. This program, with its emphasis on local control, would accomplish that goal.

Winter said he hopes the Legislature appropriates $300,000 for pilot programs in three or four cities. The cities, he said, would vary in size from a small town to a metropolitan area.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, is chief sponsor of a bill that would allow the Department of Social and Rehabilitation to cut welfare payments to parents if their children don't go to school.

Under the bill, SRS could stop Aid to Families with Dependent Children payments to the parents of children 12 to 19 if that child has 10 consecutive unexcused absences from school.

Technology affecting future of classes

DAVID PRITCHARD
Collegian Reporter

Technology may change the future of classes at K-State.

"I think in the future there will come a point where, in certain objective classes such as math and medicine, a student theoretically will never have to go to class if he could study videos and walk in and take a test," said Hanley Jackson, professor of music.

The Department of Music already uses such a program to supplement an ear-training course. The program is called Guido. It's an interactive audio/video computer program that allows a student to study ear training on an individual basis.

The process of interactive audio/video computing is made possible by a system called Society of Motion Picture and Television Engineers time code, Jackson said.

SMPTE time code was actually developed by NASA, he said. It strikes a channel of tape with digital information. The digital information shows hours, minutes, seconds and frames and allows audio to be in exact synchronization with video.

It used to take two people to practice ear training, one person to play notes on an instrument and another to try to determine what was played, Jackson said. But, Guido allows a student to get on a computer and do a lesson at his own speed, and when he's through the computer will mark the lesson completed.

"The teacher can use this to see what lessons the student has completed, which ones he needs to complete and to recommend new lessons," Jackson said.

"What we'll be seeing in the future is that a student can go to a computer at home or a library and be able to look at a lesson, get questions on a lesson, and if he misses a question, the computer will tell him where to go back and study," he explained. "If he gets certain questions right, the computer will go forward and skip information the student doesn't need."

Another area Jackson said that will continue to develop will be the use of compact disc drives.

"Most people aren't really aware of what kind of information can be put on a CD and the kind of power that is going on when you play back a CD," he said. "It's amazing. The technology 20 years ago would have been unthinkable."

Jackson said a normal CD can hold about 75 minutes of music, which equals more than 200 million bytes of information. Then to put those numbers in perspective one CD could hold all the information in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, Roget's Thesaurus and the American Zip Code Dictionary.

"So, instead of having a volume of encyclopedias, a person will have just one CD," he said.

Jackson has been studying electronic music since 1964, when he learned by looking over his professors' shoulders.

"At that time there were no classes in electronic music. There weren't even any classes in computer science," he said. "If I look back at my best dictionary, I could find as an undergraduate, the word 'byte' isn't even in there."

Jackson, who now teaches composition and electronic music classes, started the University's first electronic music studio in 1970 in a janitor's closet in McCain Auditorium.

MIDI allows me to be the whole orchestra.

—Bill Wingfield
music department accompanist

"When we bought our first synthesizer in 1970, there were no books, no classes and only three prominent electronic music studios," he said. "Ours was the first in a five-state area."

The first synthesizer the school bought was an ARP 2500, and it is still Jackson's main teaching tool for the electronic music class.

"I don't care how old that thing gets, there couldn't be a finer teaching machine," he said. "With today's synthesizers it's all in a little black box and you just have to punch some little buttons. When things change you haven't the slightest idea why they change."

The ARP allows the user to manually alter sound using knobs instead of buttons so the user can physically see what's being done to change the sound, he said.

The studio is still 50-60 percent privately endowed and has never had an operating budget.

"When we started in 1970, we had one two-channel reel-to-reel tape machine, and I brought my personal tape machine from home so we could dub back and forth between the two," Jackson said. "And the playback equipment was mine also — so we built from there."

He said now the studio contains more than $150,000 of equipment.

"If I could convince people to give us money, I could go to the University or the graduate school and ask them to match it, and many times I'd be successful," he said.

One of the biggest developments in the electronic music field was the workstation concept, Jackson said.

"One prediction I made probably 10 years ago was that the industry would go towards one large kind of system that would do everything," he said. "But, it really didn't develop."

"What has developed is a workstation concept and an individual module concept that, in many ways, is much better," Jackson said. "You hook up all these things using Musical Instrument Digital Interface and SMPTE time code. The advantage to that concept is you can add units one at a time."

MIDI and SMPTE time code have allowed many musicians the freedom to have a vast array of musical instruments and sounds all on one computer disk.

"Equipment today is aimed at the commercial musician," Jackson said. "What you get is equipment that is very simple to use because everything is pre-voiced, and you can buy additional disks of voices."

Bill Wingfield, accompanist for the music department, also speaks highly of MIDI technology.

"MIDI allows me to be the whole orchestra," Wingfield said.

Wingfield owns his own electronic music studio and is co-owner of Dess Studios, which does commercial jingles. He also plays keyboard for the Diamond Rio Band.

"For almost everything I do, I use MIDI technology," he said. "It allows me to play fully arranged musical compositions that usually can't be played with just two hands."

Although developments in digital technology make playing music easier, Wingfield said, learning how digital synthesis actually works is another thing.

"Anyone can learn how to run the machines, and it does make playing music more accessible to anyone. But if you wanted to know how things worked in depth, it might take years and years," he said.

Past protests remembered

Nichols fire highlights era

CANDY MCNICKLE
Collegian Reporter

Racial unrest, war protests, the assassinations of Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert Kennedy and the 1968 burning of Nichols Gymnasium were just a few of the incidents K-State students were faced with 20 years ago.

The time between 1960 and 1972 was known as the "Period of Discontent" at K-State.

Students of that time were greatly affected by campus and national issues.

Perhaps one of the most stunning events of the period happened Dec. 13, 1968, when Nichols Gymnasium caught on fire between 11 and 11:30 p.m. One hour later, everything was gone.

The next week, a student wrote a letter about burning the University, but actually meant that someone might "consider" it. This resulted in a strong outcry from the University for his expulsion.

After the burning of Nichols, K-State soon became known as "Pyro-Tech University" to its peers.

Bill Stallard, former K-State student and Wamego resident, remembers the burning of Nichols.

"We were stunned," Stallard said. "I was a radio/television major, and we had to have all of our classes downtown using equipment donated from radio stations. This was a personal loss to us as RTV students, because all of the equipment that was in Nichols was brand new."

"We didn't know what to do. We felt so helpless. We didn't even know what to do about classes that next semester," Stallard said.

The late '60s to early '70s was also a delicate time because of the Vietnam War, which led to protest and much conflict among the students. One item recalled was a "MAY DAY" flyer posted on the door of Farrell Library April 13, 1971.

The flyer stated: "If you want to take positive action against war, racism and sexism meet at UMHE—1021 Denison on Sunday April 18 at 7:30 p.m. Bring ideas and good vibes. 'If government won't stop war, we'll stop government.'"

On May 6, 1970, Captain Michael Scaccia, a Marine recruiter, talked with students in the Union about Kent State and the situation in Cambodia. When asked what they felt about the incident at Kent State, the students became very upset and said they didn't like the National Guard being called in.

Students were also negative about Cambodia. Students criticized the elections, censorship of the press and the treatment of people in South Vietnam.

Chester Peters recalls a similar incident that took place in 1971.

"Twenty-five hundred students gathered in front of Anderson Hall and then proceeded to march to the Military Science Hall. While they were marching, students carried a coffin representing the fact they wanted to bury the war," Peters said.

On May 14, 1970, support for those killed at Kent State was shown when about 1,500 K-State students met in front of the Statehouse in Topeka to demand a law be passed forbidding Kansans to serve in an undeclared war.

Petitions with about 4,000 signatures were shown to the crowd and also to Governor Docking. Following a presentation of the petitions, there was a 15-minute silent vigil to commemorate the Kent State deaths, nine blacks that died in Augusta, Ga., and the soldiers in Vietnam. Persons present stood and put their joined hands in the air.

This was also a time for extreme individuality among students, which was reflected in personal appearance. Beards, long hair, and all types of different clothing were popular.

1965 marked the first picket for Positive Action. The reason behind this was the need for optional ROTC, which was required for the first four semesters for all male students. The picket took place peacefully at the Memorial Stadium where the ROTC review was taking place.

Again, in May of '67 ROTC was the focus of angry picketers. Students picketed on the west lawn next to the Military Science Hall to get a compulsory ROTC and a ruling that women would be allowed to enroll.

Conservative students didn't like the demonstration and felt the picketers were interfering with God, the country, the flag and support of the United States defense.

But, the atmosphere at K-State was relatively calm compared to the more radical schools toward the east coast, like Kent State and Colombia, John Cowan, former K-State student and Manhattan resident, said.

"I came from Virginia, so K-State was pretty calm, but they had great concerts, like Jethro Tull," said Cowan. "And there was lot of preaching done outside of the Union."

James Hamilton, associate professor of philosophy, said, "K-State had a real sense of mood. I came from the University of Texas, in Austin, and K-State had a much more conservative student body than the hostile one in Texas. K-State is more tolerant with their students. Students here thought I was too abrasive and my lifestyle wasn't acceptable because of my long hair."

But long hair wasn't the only strange trend on campus, said Carol Oukrop, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass

School pays parents for participation

By the Associated Press

OAKLAND — An inner-city school is trying a new tactic to interest parents in their children's education: paying them.

The experimental program at Webster Elementary School in east Oakland pays parents $100 each for taking an 11-week program for teaching ways of helping children in the classroom and with homework.

Nine parents have graduated, picking up $100 plus a $50 bonus for achieving goals set out at the start of the program.

The program costs between $15,000 and $20,000 and may be extended to Cox Elementary School in the spring, school officials said.

"It's somewhat controversial," said Paul Brekke-Miesner, director of the school district's health and safety program. "Some people think parents should assume responsibility on their own. In a perfect world that might be the case, but this isn't a perfect world."

Those who do not complete the program don't get paid.

One parent who did, Patricia McTyer, 39, said "I would have taken it anyway. We got so much out of it."

"I want to help my child to be a better student. The $100 just made it sweeter," said McTyer, who has a second-grader at Webster.

"We plan to keep them involved," said Willie Hamilton, principal of Webster. "We want to take their energy and put it to use around here."

Mae Monroe, president of the Oakland Council PTA, questioned whether the financially strapped district should be paying parents to get involved.

"I personally don't feel parents should be paid to do anything with their child," she said. "But if this is the only way they think parents will come, what can I say?"

Group organizes silent peace vigil

Group concentrates on educating public

ULRIKE DAUER
Staff Reporter

There will be a silent vigil, organized by the Campus Coalition for Peace, from noon to 1 p.m. Friday in front of the Union.

Members of the coalition are now working to provide educational material for the people on campus and plan to distribute literature at the event.

"Our group is now geared more towards educating people about the situation in the Middle East," Marcella Wilson, sophomore in political science, said. "We want students to be able to make a rational judgment about the war."

The group, which has in the past organized marches and demonstrations, will now focus on small forums in dorms and high schools, Wilson said.

"The intellectual point of view is now more important," she said.

A visiting member of VOICE, a similar organization at the University of Kansas, gave the coalition many new ideas Sunday, she said.

Compared to the activities at other universities, the peace movement at K-State has just started. The sister organization at KU — with about 300 members on campus — is much more active.

VOICE has had an information table in the KU Union every day; they have been writing letters to the editor; and they hold peace vigils every Sunday, Wilson said.

"The people there are a little bit more progressive overall," Wilson said. "I think that people here especially hesitate to speak out."

Wilson said one possible reason for the hesitation might be because several people that have spoken out at K-State have been harassed, while people in Lawrence haven't.

The Coalition for Peace at K-State became active in October 1990, when the United States began sending troops into the gulf area, Talat Rahman, associate professor of physics and adviser of the group, said.

"The goal is to provide a critical analysis about the political situation in the war area and to take a look at why the United States is in the Middle East," Rahman said.

The group on campus has 40 members now — students, faculty and community members, Wilson said.

The problem is the students, Wilson said.

"Either they are indifferent or they think that it does not make a difference whether they join a group or not."

Victim remembered, memorial organized

BETH GAINES
Collegian Reporter

Remember the happy times. That's what Akim Reynolds, sophomore in arts and sciences, said he wants to do — the times before a Jan. 9 car accident took the life of former K-State student Kevin Haffener.

Reynolds, longtime friend of Haffener, was in the same vehicle when the accident occurred north of El Dorado.

Reynolds, a friendly, outgoing individual, worked out with Haffener at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex on a daily basis.

"I want people to remember Kevin," Reynolds said.

Reynolds has organized a fund drive to purchase a Smith Power Rack. This weight lifting equipment will be donated to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex in Haffener's memory.

Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services, said this will be the first time equipment has been donated in the form of a memorial.

"It's a great idea, I'm sure that the equipment will be used," Martini said.

A plaque will be mounted on the equipment at the Rec Complex so everyone who uses the equipment may remember Haffener.

Leslie Bookout, junior in mathematics, knew Haffener for about a year.

"He had good insight and knew people. He was right most of the time," she said.

"Kevin made an impact on people in his own way. He never wanted attention, for example, he hated having his picture taken. I think he would be glad to know that he had good friends who want to remember him," Bookout said.

Individuals wanting to contribute to the memorial may do so by contacting the KSU Foundation.

Communications. "We had a spell of students bringing their pets to class," Oukrop said. "I taught a black lab, a blue healer, and a black- and-white dog named Harvey. I especially remember a coyote and dog mix, named Sheeba that couldn't come to class anymore because she got sick in the classroom."

It was also during this period that students expressed their concern for a free University by creating the University For Man.

John McCulloh, head of the history department, said, "UFM reflected the characteristics of the late 60s. It was felt that students should teach and learn without formal structure. Today UFM promotes informal education for the community."

Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement, said K-State had high student involvement during the late '60s and the '70s.

"This affected input in curriculum, student government representatives, and University communication," Bosco said.

The dissent at K-State was instrumental in the change of ROTC policies; allowed individuals to put forth their feelings and students to get more heavily involved in what was happening to themselves educationally and socially.

understand them better," Sweetman said.

"Everyone thinks that snakes are mean and that they bite," Entriken said.

He said snakes rarely bite, and when they do they only have rows of little teeth that feel like pin pricks.

The misconception about snakes which comes across often, is that snakes are slimy and gross. Sweetman says they are just the opposite, that snakes are very dry, but just look smooth and when you touch them they feel like silk.

Entriken and Sweetman have had various responses from visitors who have not been prepared to see the snakes.

Entriken said, "Once a person was inside by the front door and as soon as a snake was brought out he left, and I've never seen him again."

Big Red 1 fights on Saudi border

By the Associated Press

FORT RILEY — A 1st Infantry Division unit has been involved in sporadic conflict with Iraqi troops over the last two weeks, a Fort Riley spokeswoman confirmed.

In the first incident, a cavalry scout unit spotted a four-man Iraqi patrol along the border between Saudi Arabia and Iraq, said Jeanette Krueger, a Fort Riley public affairs specialist.

The cavalry unit fired TOW missiles from a Bradley Fighting Vehicle at an Iraqi vehicle the following night. The Iraqi vehicle retreated, she said.

The next night the unit's scout team spotted an Iraqi armored vehicle. With air support from Cobra attack helicopters, the Iraqi vehicle was destroyed by TOW missiles.

Two nights later the scout team again detected Iraqi action. The Cobra pilots were again called in to destroy the Iraqi targets, Krueger said.

Iraq, Soviets to talk

By the Associated Press

NICOSIA, Cyprus — Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has told a Soviet envoy Baghdad is prepared to cooperate with the Soviet Union and other nations to find a peaceful solution to the Persian Gulf War, Baghdad radio reported early today.

The radio, monitored in Nicosia, said Soviet envoy Yevgeny Primakov gave Saddam a message from Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev during talks late Tuesday. The message contained the Soviet's view of the regional conflict, the radio said without providing any other details.

"Iraq is prepared to extend cooperation to the Soviet Union and other nations and agencies in the interest of finding a peaceful, political, equitable and honorable solution to the region's central issues, including the situation in the gulf," the radio quoted Saddam as saying.

Information Ministry officials in Baghdad earlier Tuesday said Primakov, who arrived Monday, was carrying the latest Kremlin proposals for halting the war.

Moscow has expressed concern that the allied war plans might exceed the goals set out by the U.N. Security Council resolutions, which call for the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait and the restoration of the Kuwaiti government.

Professor pulls daughter from school

Pacifist family finds beliefs difficult in time of war while disagreeing with policies of U.S. government

DAVID FRESE
Staff Reporter

Cia Verschelden pulled her 10-year-old daughter, Patty, out of school the day Patty's class sang "God Bless America."

"When is this going to stop?" Verschelden asks. "When are we going to start singing 'God Bless the World'?"

Verschelden is an associate professor in sociology, anthropology and social work and a practicing pacifist. The walls in her tiny, windowless office in Waters Hall are covered with artwork and posters, many of which her two daughters painted, drew and assembled for her. Others are posters of thinkers, movers and shakers.

On one wall somewhat hidden behind the office door is a poster of Albert Einstein with a quote beneath it that reads "Great spirits have always found violent opposition from mediocrities."

"It's difficult to be a pacifist in this society," she said. "It's difficult any time you are a minority."

In Verschelden's peaceful minority it is tough to make a statement saying it's immoral to kill other people because a flag-waving, "USA-all-the-way" mentality has invaded America on account of the Persian Gulf War.

"When you're trying to make a statement that it is immoral to kill people on the surface that sounds very reasonable," she said. "Yet, it's so much against what the majority is saying, and you start to question yourself. 'Am I the crazy one?'"

Verschelden said she does not believe in her government. After spending time in Central America, watching the United States pump literally billions of dollars into so-called democracies only to see people remain poor and beaten down and good leaders fall, she said she cannot find faith in her leaders.

"Central America is a mess," she said. "A huge mass of people are as poor as they ever were there. The United States is backing governments that are just horrible, that we are happy to call democracies. The conditions for the people have worsened if anything."

Central America is only the iceberg's tip, and the gulf war has opened up a whole new can of worms. Verschelden said it depresses her a great deal. To escape from it she said she hardly ever picks up a newspaper and seldom watches the news on television, mainly because she doesn't believe half of what the government and the media is passing off as the truth.

"It's been amusing and disgusting to see the criticisms by newspapers of the censorship by Iraq," she said. "What gets into our press are things that rich white men want us to read. We see what they want us to see. We don't call it censorship, but that's what it is."

To combat that censorship, Verschelden said all Americans — and citizens of the world — need to stand up and demand the lies end, and let the government know what they are doing all over the world is wrong.

"We are, each person, responsible and liable for what our government does," she said. "I feel it is our responsibility as citizens to disagree publicly with what the government is doing. If we believe that war is not a reasonable way to interact, then we have to be saying it as part of our responsibility as citizens."

But there are some responsibilities even Verschelden must own up to, such as paying taxes.

There are very few ways dissenters can keep their tax money from going into the U.S. war machine. Verschelden said anyone paying taxes is paying people to kill for them. In much the same way, anyone who takes advantage of American freedoms is as much to blame for America as are the politicians.

"I, as a pacifist in spite of my conscience, have to pay my federal income taxes," she said. "More than half of which goes into the military. I don't have to pay them, but if I don't pay then I'll get harassed by the IRS, and they'll get it anyway. They'll take it out of the bank or they'll take my house or my car, and they'll get it. You can't be a pacifist financially."

There is such a thing as war tax resistance and Verschelden's husband did resist taxes prior to their marriage. But he was harassed by the IRS, which made his life miserable for a while and eventually it got the money anyway. Now that the two are married and have two children it's a risk they're not willing to take.

Verschelden said she sometimes wonders whether she is doing the right thing. She said her beliefs strongly influence what her children think. Pacifism is not a coward's way out, she said, but it is her way of dealing with the guilt of an American government hell-bent on military conquests.

She said her beliefs are not easy ones to live with and are only complicated by the addition of children to her life.

It's difficult enough to have ideas different from the rest of the crowd when you're an adult, let alone when you're 10 and you live next door to a military base, Verschelden said.

"We get this rubbed in our face all the time," she said. "How can you express that it's not right to be killing people with other kids whose father or mother is in the military and is doing that for a living?"

There have been a couple of activities at school in support of the military that caused Verschelden and her husband to take Patty out of school, one of which was the singing of "God Bless America."

But it's not just the parents that have a problem with the war. Patty said she doesn't think it's right, either. It makes her angry and sad, Verschelden said, but the family does its best to discuss it a lot.

Shortly after the soldiers left from Fort Riley, Patty came home from school with a concerned look on her face, Verschelden said. She had been assigned during school to write a letter to a soldier with no family.

"She came home from school that day and told me she didn't think I would've approved of that," Verschelden said. "I asked her what she did and she said, 'I just drew peace symbols all over the piece of paper.' I thought that was a good compromise."

Qualified admissions bill heard

RYAN HAYTER
Collegian Reporter

A new qualified admissions bill, similar to one killed by the Kansas House of Representatives last year, was introduced to the Kansas Senate Education Committee last week.

If passed, Senate Bill 145 would require high school applicants and others under 21 years of age to meet standards of high school curriculum, class rank or ACT scores before they would be allowed to enter regent schools. Those applicants more than 21 years old would rarely be affected.

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president for government relations at K-State, said K-State backs the Kansas Board of Regents position to support the admissions bill.

"Currently, if you graduate from any high school accredited by the Board of Regents, you must be accepted into any state educational institution," Peterson said. "The bill's purpose is to have better qualified students coming into the system."

"The biggest impact that qualified admissions may have is that it might decrease the number of years students would spend in college because they will be better prepared," she said.

A 1987 study conducted by the University showed 78 percent of the fall freshman class admitted to K-State had met the criteria set forth by a similar bill that year.

In the study, 75 percent of the students were in the top third of their high school class, and 36 percent had taken the classes required by the bill.

Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for Institutional Advancement, said 52 percent of the 2,779 freshmen who entered K-State in the fall 1990 semester did not meet the 23-point ACT score minimum.

"There is some concern that the ACT tests are biased and culturally unfair," Lynch said. "(Standardized tests) are only recommended, not required. Ethnic minorities tend to shy away from them. Fewer than 23 percent of minorities have achieved a 23 or above (on the tests)."

Lynch said if the ACT scores were the only requirement for qualified admissions, the bill would be problematic, but the other options balance it out.

Educational institutions may allow 15 percent of new students to be admitted due to exemptions prescribed by the bill. This may aid minority admissions, but members of the Legislative Educational Planning Committee are concerned the exemptions may be used to admit athletes.

Senate Majority Leader Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, said the bill would provide more incentive for kids to do well in high school and help place them at a level in which they could succeed.

"Currently there is an excessive number of freshmen not ready to suc-

New requirements for admissions

If a bill currently being discussed by a Kansas Senate sub-committee passes, a student must meet one of the three following requirements before they can enter a Kansas Board of Regents university.

- Applicants must complete a pre-college curriculum prescribed by the regents with a minimum 2.0 GPA.
- Applicants must have an ACT composite score of not less than 23.
- Applicants must rank in the top one-third of their high school class upon completion of seven or eight semesters.
- Applicants 21 years old or older need only to have graduated from an accredited high school or have earned the GED certificate with a score of 50 or better.

Kansas regents schools

There are six Kansas public universities and one independent college governed by the Kansas Board of Regents. Notable exceptions to following lists are all of the state's public community and junior colleges, which fall under control of the Board of Education.

1. Emporia State University, Emporia
2. Fort Hays State University, Hays
3. Kansas College of Technology, Salina
4. Kansas State University, Manhattan
5. Pittsburg State University, Pittsburg
6. University of Kansas, Lawrence

ceeded in a university setting, resulting in failure and drop-outs," he said. "It's detrimental to the students and expensive."

Kerr said the bill has a better chance to pass this year, because there is more concern about the overcrowding at regent schools and improving public schools.

"I've heard representatives and senators who were in disagreement say they believe this (bill) to be a solid educational concept," he said. "This is the most serious effort yet undertaken in the Senate over qualified admissions."

If passed, the bill would not take effect until the 1995-96 academic year.

Kremlin announces end of Warsaw Pact

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Warsaw Pact, the Soviet-led Cold-War alliance whose troops crushed reform movements in two countries, will dissolve its military structure by April, the Kremlin said Tuesday.

The Soviet Union planned to change its relations with the six other members of the alliance to bilateral ties, said Vitaly Ignatenko, a Kremlin spokesman.

Hungarian Prime Minister Jozsef Antall said pact officials will meet in Budapest, Hungary, Feb. 25 to formalize the action.

"This will be a historical moment in the life of the nation," Hungarian Prime Minister Jozsef Antall said.

The agreement to end the military alliance apparently will coincide with the termination of Comecon, the bloc's trade organization. Its formal demise also is scheduled at a summit of the group's heads of government in Budapest at the end of February, the Soviet news agency Tass said.

Hungary and Czechoslovakia were invaded by Warsaw Pact forces to crush reform movements in 1956 and 1968, respectively.

For months, they have sought dissolution of the pact's military structure by June and abolition of the alliance early next year.

Ignatenko told reporters the dissolution would be completed by April. He said the Soviets hope the move "will reduce military confrontation in Europe" and end the face-off between Eastern and Western blocs.

"We expect some reaction from the NATO countries," he said without elaboration.

Since the collapse of Communist regimes in Poland, East Germany, Hungary and Czechoslovakia in 1989, Soviet officials have been calling for the transformation of Eastern and Western alliances from military into political organizations.

A NATO spokesman responded to the Kremlin announcement by saying, "It is up to the member countries of the Warsaw Treaty Organization to decide upon their own future security policy and the relevance of the Warsaw Treaty Organization in this regard."

Under the pact, the Eastern European countries shared some weaponry and military command.

Teacher refuses to recite pledge

DOVER, Del. (AP) — A teacher who contends the Persian Gulf War is immoral said he will not recite the Pledge of Allegiance with students each morning.

"I told (the principal) as long as the United States was in the war, I would not participate in the pledge to the flag," William Hutchison Jr., 43, said Monday.

"It's just something that I felt I had to do. This was for my own conscience and was not meant to be any kind of public statement," said Hutchison, a seventh-grade social studies teacher at Central Middle School.

Man to be returned for prosecution

COFFEYVILLE (AP) — A man accused of killing his grandmother and aunt in Kansas and then fleeing to Texas has waived extradition and will be returned for prosecution, authorities said.

Authorities were expected to return Danny Ray Royse to Kansas on Wednesday, said Allen Flowers, Coffeyville police chief.

Royse, 30, of Irving, Texas, has been charged with two counts of first-degree murder. He was arrested last week in Irving for the slayings of his grandmother, Florence Royse, 87, and his aunt, Elsie Hinthorn, 70.

WSU fraternity penalized for hazing

WICHITA (AP) — A fraternity at Wichita State University is on two years probation for hazing.

Several incidents led to the action imposed by the university, according to information released by the national offices of Beta Theta Pi. The fraternity was also ordered to bring a speaker to campus to address the issue of hazing for all fraternities and sororities.

In one 1989 incident, a group of pledges in the basement of the fraternity house heard members upstairs arguing. One came downstairs wielding a pistol, then the lights went off. Terrified, the pledges scrambled for the back door, only to find it boarded up.

Other occurrences included making pledges push books around on the floor with their noses and requiring one youth to shine 10 pairs of shoes in a day or be kicked out of the fraternity.

Hazing is defined as any act that intentionally produces mental or physical discomfort or embarrassment.

If Beta Theta Pi members haze again, the fraternity could be kicked off campus, officials said.

Selection of jurors slow in trial

ROLLA, Mo. (AP) — Attorneys excused more than half of the first 112 potential jurors questioned by the end of Tuesday in the trial of a man accused of killing five of his farm workers.

Jury selection bogged down behind schedule in the second day of questioning. Sixty-seven candidates were asked not to return, most of them saying they already had formed an opinion on Ray Copeland's guilt or innocence based on news reports.

KU crime rate rises 20 percent

LAWRENCE (AP) — The crime rate at the University of Kansas rose by 20 percent last year, marking the highest level in the last nine years, campus police said.

Campus officers investigated 1,612 cases last year, which is up 268 from 1989, Lt. John Mullens, university police community services division, said Tuesday. Arrests also were up by about 20 percent to 309, he said.

Mullens attributed the increase in reported crime to a similar rise in some crime categories in Lawrence.

He also said the university changed its policy of replacing lost or stolen bus passes, which contributed to a greater number being reported to campus police.

Pancake race pre-Lenten event

LIBERAL (AP) — It seemed like a great day for the race, with temperatures in the mid-50s, but not good enough for an American victory in the International Pancake Race.

In fact, Donetta Schindler put some of the blame on the good weather in this southwestern Kansas town on Shrove Tuesday.

Schindler, 25, fell short of a 66-second pancake-flipping run by Alison Steele through a snowstorm in Olney, England, where the pre-Lenten event began in 1445.

According to the tradition, an absent-minded Olney housewife that year raced off for Shrove Tuesday church services wearing her apron and carrying a frying pan with a pancake in it. In subsequent years neighbor women joined in, competing to see who would be the first to reach the church steps and collect a kiss of peace from the bell ringer.

Student perceptions of U.S.S.R. improve

Geography professor conducts survey 7th time in 11 years

Student views on the U.S.S.R.

Students are asked to fill out a questionnaire in Professor David Kromm's Geography of the Soviet Union class. Students rate statements using the following scale:

1. Does not describe at all.
2. Describes poorly.
3. Generally describes.
4. Describes well.
5. Strongly describes.

The chart below shows averages of student responses from three different years. Notice the increased in perceived understanding for the Soviet Union as the Iron Curtain has come down.

Categories	1984	1988	1991
Backward	2.41	2.11	2.43
Affluent	2.41	2.44	2.55

Perceptions of the Soviet Union have changed for the better over the last 10 years, according to a survey completed by David Kromm, professor of geography.

Kromm gave the survey to 37 students in his Geography of the Soviet Union class on the first day of classes this semester. In the first part, questions were asked concerning the size, population and products of the Soviet Union in relation to the United States.

"Most are aware that the Soviet Union is more than twice the size of the United States, and nearly all know that it has more people," Kromm said.

The students, on the whole, missed the question on the products, he said. Although most knew the Soviet Union outproduces the United States in petroleum and iron ore, only three students said the Soviet Union produces more wheat and milk.

"I think many students believe we produce more food than any country in the world," Kromm said. "What they fail to take into account is the land area and the population. We produce more per person in aggregate, but it's still less."

Kromm has given the same survey seven times during the last 11 years. He said the basic knowledge has remained constant, but the image of the Soviet Union has changed a great deal.

In the survey, the students were asked to rate the Soviet Union in 10 areas, including power, peacefulness and technological advancement. A one rating means the student thinks the term does not describe the country at all, and a five rating means it provides a strong description.

Compared to past surveys, the country is seen as follows:

- the least aggressive, least advanced and least powerful,
- the most backward and most peace loving.

Kromm said the views accurately tell the story of conditions in the Soviet Union.

"I think that represents Gorbachev coming forward with political reforms and withdrawing from trying to control Eastern Europe," he said.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science, said the survey may have painted an accurate picture at one time, but not now.

"The reforms began in 1987 and left a substantial imprint on the whole system," Hajda said. "Beginning in early 1990, there have been measures that are in part a retreat from economical reform."

Hajda said the food shortages, instability in the Baltic republics and new denials of free speech are recent examples of the Soviet Union's retreat to hardline communism.

Students should not be expected to have a sophisticated knowledge of the Soviet Union, Hajda said. The media should help bring the knowledge to students.

With a war raging in the Persian Gulf, the media have placed the events in the Soviet Union and elsewhere on the backburner, Hajda said.

"Since the media have singled out the war, the degree of sophistication probably isn't there," he said.

Education in the United States does not place an emphasis on geography as European countries do, Hajda said. Other students might do worse on the survey than those in Kromm's class because there is little interest.

"(The students) know it's not a political democracy," Hajda said. "Maybe they know the Soviet Union has a very good basketball team."

Kromm said the reforms in the last few years have sparked more of an interest in the Soviet Union. This semester, 44 people are enrolled in his class, more than at any other time.

"More than anything else, people feel that history is being made," he said.

Valentine's Day sale slated

SUZANNE BROWN

After disbanding five years ago, the Retail Floriculture Club is again in full bloom.

"The club has existed over 12 years, but it was dropped for a while when students weren't willing to organize it," said Dr. Kent Kimmins, associate professor of horticulture and faculty advisor for the group.

Last semester, Kimmins had a meeting to determine the number of interested students.

"There was a group of students who were interested in firing it up again," Kimmins said.

"About 12 or 15 people showed up, so our advisor decided to start the group," Robin Johnson, sophomore in horticulture and president of the club, said.

"The function of the group is mainly to promote retail floriculture," Kimmins said.

Retail floriculture is an associate degree program in the Department of Horticulture. The program was started 25 to 30 years ago as a certificate degree and it was upgraded in 1983 to an associate degree, Kimmins said.

"The club promotes retail floriculture and the retail florist. It helps the group have an identity and they share a common interest. It is more specialized and they get more out of it for what they're shooting for in their future," Kimmins said.

The club meets every other Tuesday evening. At these meetings the group hears various speakers and does some arranging and practice of floral design concepts.

"We took several field trips last semester. One was to a wholesale house in Wichita," Johnson said.

EDITORIAL

Unison-in-tension standard shapes world

I started making preparations late last week. First I went through the bottom drawer of my bureau and found a box of 200 colored toothpicks. I started by putting a few of these in each of my shirt and coat pockets. Then I put the remaining ones in the box on the corner of my desk, making sure I could see them from any place in the room.

Next, I went to the store and bought a supply of instant coffee and tea. Caffeine is a staple in my everyday existence anyway, but I figured that under the circumstances I'd better keep quite a bit of it on hand.

Then I filled the refrigerator with pop. I don't usually drink too much pop, but I thought that it would give me one more thing to keep in my hand — just in case the urge returned. I wanted to be ready for the worst when it started. I wanted to be prepared.

My roommate didn't know what to make of all this. He watched me move around the room while I carefully placed my toothpicks. He watched me come in with my grocery bags and unload my haul of coffee, tea and pop. But only when I explained, did he seem to have some idea of what was going on. "I'm gonna stop smoking," I said.

As I write this I've been cold turkey, without a cigarette, for two days. I feel like hell. Little things are getting to me. My cough is dying out, but my fatigue and my irritability remind me that it's not over yet. I'm sucking on toothpicks and chewing gum to keep my mouth busy. I keep a coffee cup in my hand when I'm in my dorm room.

Luckily, I have a lot to do. It seems easiest when I work intently on something else and don't think about it.

But it's bad when I slow down on whatever I've been working on. In the past months, it is at times like these that I would have taken a break, gone outside for a walk and smoked a few. By my own resolution, I can't do that anymore. And realizing that it's not a possibility (when I'm practically on my way out with a cigarette already in my fingers) is a little maddening.

I guess I knew it would come to this someday. I never really thought about quitting, but I figured I probably had more of an addiction to it than I ever realized while I was doing it. I've always known the health issues. It's also more expensive than ever. But up until now, quitting was simply something that I didn't want to do. I knew there was a risk, but until now I wasn't ready to stop.

Collegian Columnist

And judging by the way I feel, I doubt I could have quit before now. It was a decision I had to make in my own time. It was a decision that no one could have forced upon me. I don't know why it seemed so important that I smoke. But I know until I made up my own mind it was something I no longer wanted to do, there was no way I could have successfully quit.

My lack of answers in the scheme of all of these questions fascinates me: Why did I start smoking? Why did I decide to stop smoking? Why was it so important to me until now? And why has it now ceased to matter?

I've had a lot of prepared answers for these

I've had a lot of prepared answers for these kinds of questions; answers that sound like something a character in a movie may have said. But the truth is, I'm not really sure why my life has been the way it has.

What I do know is now that I've finally decided to quit smoking, I'm happy about it. I don't exactly regret the two years or so that I have been smoking. For some reason, these two years have been something I didn't seem to think I could face in any other way.

I think the smoking filled a void in my life. I think it was a substitute for a confidence I lacked when I started smoking, but have since contacted. I attached those cigarettes to myself. For a while, they were a symbolic substitute for something else I needed but didn't have. For a while, the picture I carried of myself in my head included an inevitable cigarette, dangling from my mouth.

But now there is a new void in my life. It has been created by my rejection of the thing I once thought I needed. Where once the dynamic presence of a cigarette in my mouth was my crutch, the dynamic lack of that same cigarette now, for a while, promises to drive me mad. I only hope I have the strength and the will to successfully carry out my conviction to quit.

tion to quit.

Life in transition seems like such a fragile thing. The things we do to maintain or improve the orders of our lifestyles sometimes threaten to throw those same lifestyles into chaos. Unison-in-tension is perhaps the standard by which most of us live, whether we know it or not. We strive to improve our worlds, to keep our lives intact, yet we push and stretch ourselves uncomfortably to hold everything together.

It's a real balancing act, sometimes, to keep the condition of our lives in order. Living is hard work. In some respects, mere existence is an art. So much of what we do is simply keeping ourselves together.

There's quite an irony in the term "unison-in-tension," but I think that it's a useful concept for understanding these lives we must live. It seems sometimes we are most comfortable in conflict. Sometimes our problems give us more to believe in than our convictions.

Parking lot problems need shuttle solution

A battle takes place on K-State's campus every day. It begins at 8 a.m. and doesn't stop until late afternoon. You know who the participants are. You see them every day.

They sit in their car and wait, their eyes peeled, ready to move in on the first open target.

They're waiting for a parking space.

An innocent student emerges from a building to find he is being followed by a slow-moving car as he walks across the parking lot. He approaches a parked car and fumbles for his backpack. But no, he moves on to the crosswalk.

He's just a pedestrian. No use to the frustrated driver looking for a parking spot.

It's 9:25 a.m. The driver has a class at 9:30. He's getting desperate. He pulls into the tow-away zone and hopes for the best.

He comes back to his car after class and spots about 20 open parking spaces. But it's too late. He has already gotten a ticket.

It happens every day. So get a parking permit, you say. That would work, except a great deal more permits are sold than there are actual parking spaces.

This results in students having $20 rearview mirror ornaments, because having a permit does not guarantee a parking space unless you are willing to show up between 7-8 a.m. and fight for one.

Get here after 9 a.m. and forget it. You'll be driving around the parking lot all day.

K-State just does not have room to build a new parking lot, nor does it have the money to build a parking garage. It does, however, have a parking lot that isn't being used.

Bramlage Coliseum. The University could follow the precedent set by area apartment complexes and offer a shuttle service. Other universities have already implemented such plans. And it's cost-effective.

Rather than spend $20 to battle for a parking spot, students could pay $10 to park at Bramlage and ride to campus. This would be especially helpful to students who commute from nearby towns. It wouldn't be much of an extra effort to drive to Bramlage.

Maybe someday we will get that parking garage, but until then, we have to work with what we have.

Fans speak up

Editor,

With only two home basketball games left in the season, we would like to voice our outrage to some of our fellow front-row fans. We are referring to the ones at the Iowa State game, where we were surprisingly told to stop yelling by the somber fans in the front row who couldn't handle the noise.

We have two pieces of advice for future games. One: be profitable. Sell your ticket and watch the game on television. And two: do the admirable thing and sit high enough from the court so your ears won't be burning from the vocal enthusiasm we show. Maybe this way we can all enjoy the game at our own pace.

Germany responsible

Editor,

So the Germans don't like us. Well, at least America didn't sell Saddam Hussein chemical warfare weapon's technology, improve the range of Scud missiles or try to export nuclear detonators to Iraq.

The Germans didn't like us in the 1940s either, except when we rebuilt their cities, flew the Berlin airlift and kept the Soviets out of West Germany.

Germans shouldn't worry about the Americans; it's the Israelis they should be concerned with. The whole world knows German companies sold Saddam nerve gas and improved the Scud missile. Of all nations, Germany should know better than to distribute chemical weapons. Especially when Israel was a known target.

Review rebutted

Editor,

I'd first of all like to thank you for sending Dave Pritchard to cover an event as important as a regional band poised to return to national prominence. I feel it a shame, however that the matter of reviewing the record was left to a member of your staff who was less informed than the person who was sent to our station and found out firsthand about Shooting Star's message and music.

Time and time again I have seen bands fall victim to college newspaper critics who have a bad taste in their mouth for anything that doesn't have paisleys or a 60s reference. So often, it seems, your reviewers appear blinded to any music that does not have some tie to alternative music. I hope the review on Shooting Star is not another case in point. Personally, I love the fresh viewpoint that much alternative music has to offer. Some of the most influential and important artists of our time come from these ranks. That is exactly why our station not only supports these artists, but features many of the emerging artists in rock music.

Every style of music however, has its own followers and influences. Straight ahead, simplistic, from the hip rock 'n' roll is exactly what Shooting Star is trying to convey. They emulate the style of many of their contemporaries and do not lay any claim to being rock 'n' roll visionaries. Invariably, all types of music (especially rock music) seem to recycle themselves. Even many of the "progressive" bands of college radio today sound like one-hit-wonder pop bands of the 70s. Nothing against these bands, they're just reflecting influences.

What truly counts is if the music is genuine; from the heart, not sampled, not sequenced and not conceived, produced and marketed from a bunch of suits in a 40-story building.

Shooting Star's music is straight-down-the-pipe rock 'n' roll without a lot of frills. This may not be the greatest album, but it certainly isn't "mindless metal and gut level boredom." If you ask me, it's great stuff to roll down the window, throw on the shades and crank up the volume to. Evidently, a lot of other people agree.

Freedoms assured

Editor,

The very essence of a university atmosphere depends on its ability to provide a free and open exchange of ideas and opinions. The truth is, a university community has to maintain and champion the age-old American principles of freedom of speech and freedom of assembly.

During this academic year, issues on campus, state and national levels have tested this foundation of our academic community at K-State. In total, I applaud the commitment of students, faculty and staff to ensure the rights of all to express their views on the issues, no matter how emotional the subject.

However, there have been a few reports of group harassment, intimidation and threats against individuals expressing their views. This University and its administration will not tolerate such actions and will do everything within its power to ensure the rights of each member of our community are protected. I know the University community will join us in this effort to maintain the academic atmosphere which makes K-State an education leader in this nation and the world.

Reader quits

Editor,

I see Ed Skoog has struck again (Feb. 11, the Collegian). Congratulations Skoog; you've just reaffirmed my opinion that brain-death is not confined to the televised media. In other words, you think you're a wit, but you're only half right.

As my capacity for intellectual slumming is limited, I don't intend to read the Collegian anymore. I find it sad that a university newspaper gives "columnists" such as Skoog and Brad Seabourn time and space. Perhaps a generation of people that murders one another for shoes and laughs at Andrew Dice Clay deserves no better.

On-line catalog gives students easy access

Using library catalog with other computers

Using K-State's new computerized catalog, LYNX, from other computers is as simple as logging on to one of K-State's mainframes.

1. Start-up computer and load software normally used to gain access to K-State's mainframes.

2. When "Select Destination" appears on the screen, type "KSUVM" and hit the RETURN or ENTER key.

3. Enter the terminal type when the prompt appears. For example, ibm, vt100.

4. Type "LYNX" when the word "LOGON" appears on the screen. Do not type your regular User ID.

5. You are now logged on to the system. Just follow the online instructions to conduct a search.

6. To log off, type "exit" or "quit" at any command line.

Students using the libraries at K-State may have an easier time doing research because of a feature available with the new on-line catalog.

This feature allows remote access by patrons. Access is available by using either a personal computer with a modem or a terminal connected to the academic mainframe through a data switch.

The remote access capability is something made available by the change to the new cataloging system last year.

University Libraries is in the process of replacing the Automated Library Information System. ALIS is being replaced by Northwestern On-Line Total Integrated System because of the limitations in expanding and using the ALIS system.

NOTIS was developed by Northwestern University. The software was purchased by University Libraries and modified to run on the upgraded University mainframe.

"This is the system of choice of major academic and research libraries," David Allen, project coordinator for the NOTIS system, said.

Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University and Emporia State University also have the NOTIS catalog in their libraries. The University of Kansas and Pittsburg State University do not use the NOTIS software in their cataloging system.

"Most large database record systems use NOTIS," Allen said. "The software must be modified to fit local needs."

The NOTIS catalog at K-State is named LYNX. It contains about 65 percent of the library's holdings in its databanks.

Allen said one advantage of this system is that several functions can share one central database. The software runs on the IBM 3084 University mainframe located in the basement of Farrell Library.

Craig Moore, reference librarian in Farrell, said he believes the LYNX catalog is user-friendly and allows patrons to find information faster

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTSBasketball squads to face teams from CU
Lady Cats looking to keep pace 'Cats hope to escape Big 8 cellarTODD FERTIG
Sports Reporter

Hoping to keep pace in the conference race, the Lady Cats look to avenge an early season loss to the Colorado Lady Buffs tonight.

Trailing Oklahoma State in the conference by one game, the Lady Cats look back wishfully on one of their three losses, a 75-74 defeat in Boulder Jan. 12. With a chance to win in the closing seconds, Nadira Hazim's shot fell short at the buzzer, giving K-State its first Big Eight loss of the season.

Coach Susan Yow, however, prefers not to dwell on the one that slipped away.

"I think we've won a few we should have lost and lost a few we should have won," Yow said. "We're probably just about where we should be. If we were something like 16-5, then maybe we might look back at that loss a little more."

In the first meeting, Colorado had one of its best outings of the season, shooting 51 percent from the field, well above the 43 percent they have compiled on the year. Missy Kraai, a reserve who hadn't reached double figures in scoring all season, tossed in 21 points and added nine rebounds to lead the squad.

"I think when we played them, they may have had one of their best games of the year," Yow said. "It could have gone either way. But we can't look back at that game now. It's important that we not look back about what could have been or look ahead to other games. We have to go out and give our best shot each time we go on the floor."

The Lady Cats dropped a game behind OSU with their disappointing loss to Oklahoma, the seventh-place team in the Big Eight. Bouncing back to win 73-61 at Iowa State Saturday brought back the confidence previously lost in the upset.

"I think the minute we won at ISU we completely forgot about the OU game," Yow said. "At this point in the season, that sort of letdown becomes less of a problem. Now your season begins to be very short. For the seniors, it's their last go-round and they should be ready to play."

Last season, the Lady Cats knocked off the defending Big Eight champion Lady Buffs at Bramlage, 71-67, breaking CU's 17-game winning streak in the conference.

At 5-5 in the Big Eight, this season has been a bit of a disappointment for Colorado. Picked by Big Eight coaches as the favorite to win the conference, the Lady Buffs are currently tied for fourth with Iowa State.

"They're a very young team, very smart and well coached," Yow said. "I would never count them out of a game. I think they are going to have a lot of success with the players they have right now in the next couple of years."

They enter tonight's matchup coming off an 82-69 upset road win over the conference's third place team, Nebraska.

The Lady Buffs are led by last season's Big Eight Newcomer-of-the-Year, 6-foot-5 center Debbie Johnson.

Johnson hurt the Lady Cats inside in their first meeting, adding 14 points and eight boards. Johnson averages 13 points and 5.2 rebounds per contest. Six-foot freshman Jamillah Lang provides dangerous firepower from the bench, contributing 11.7 points and 5.4 rebounds per contest.

K-State will try to get back in the win column tonight when it visits the Coors Event Center in Boulder, Colo., for an 8:05 tipoff with the Colorado Buffaloes.

The game will feature the two teams in the Big Eight cellar. K-State and Colorado both own 2-6 records in the Big Eight. The victor will get the pleasure of moving out of the eighth-place slot.

Earlier this season, K-State captured its first Big Eight win against the Buffaloes in Bramlage Coliseum. Stevie Wise had a chance to tie the game, and end Colorado's 54-game conference road losing streak, but his foot crossed the 3-point arc to give K-State the narrow 73-72 victory.

Tonight K-State will try to end a one-year slump of its own. The Wildcats suffered a 17-point defeat last season in Coors Event Center. It was the Wildcats' first loss in Boulder in four years, and they have lost only three times in Boulder in the series in the last 10 years.

"The team got beat by 17 points there last year. I hope it is not any harder than that. Colorado is a lot more improved team this year, and it will be a tough game," K-State coach Dana Altman said.

For K-State to be as successful as they were in Bramlage against Colorado, the defense is going to have to perform on a great level. Colorado possesses one of the best 1-2 punches in the Big Eight. The tandem of Shaun Vandiver and Wise has been a potent threat to many Big Eight teams this season.

Both are averaging more than 20 points a contest. Vandiver tallied 26 points in the Buffs' loss at Bramlage, the most points a center has scored all season against the 'Cats. And even though Wise was held to only 12, he began to explode at the end of the second half.

"They are a great 1-2 punch. Now that (Anthony) Peeler has limited playing for Missouri, I believe they are the best in the league," Altman said. "Wires will again guard (Wise). I hope Jeffrey will do a good job on him."

K-State will be trying to rebound from the 98-78 thrashing it received from Iowa State last weekend after handing Oklahoma a 95-70 defeat. That inconsistency is going to have to disappear for the 'Cats to see their third conference win of the season, according to Altman.

"We were disappointed. We thought we had made some progress and turned the corner. That loss really took some air out of our sails," Altman said. "We need to bounce back and play hard. Iowa State was just a better team that day."

Altman said he also feels the boards will be important as will their ability to connect from the field. Colorado's House Guest and Vandiver take up quite a portion of the lane, and K-State's lack of high field goal percentage has been apparent most of the season.

"We weren't as alert or as sharp as Iowa State. I'm not too sure how much Iowa State had to do with that. Against Oklahoma we were as sharp as we could be," Altman said. "Against Colorado we need to go out playing hard, get on the boards and shoot the ball well."

Nicknames provide insight into players' backgrounds, habits

Dan Wicker
Sports Reporter

With the ever-increasing trend of warm weather moving in over the Sunflower State, students are beginning to exercise and spend time outdoors instead of glued to a TV set in their rooms.

Along with this warm weather comes spring fever. That's right, it is time to catch spring fever in the form of K-State Wildcat baseball.

Yep, it is time for America's favorite pastime to swing into full action. K-State will open the season this weekend in Fayetteville, Ark., against the No. 7-ranked Razorbacks.

For those of you that do not realize the caliber of team K-State possesses, then I will gladly fill you in. The Wildcats, who were tabbed for eighth in the Big Eight last year, responded by recording the best season by K-State in several years.

They finished second behind national champion Oklahoma State with a 13-11 record, which was the most conference wins since 1974. The Wildcats also earned their first trip to the postseason tournament since 1985.

From that team of a year ago, only six players do not return while six starters and 15 lettermen are back for action on a team with only four seniors.

Now, I know most of you K-State fans do not know the baseball players as well as you might know the last 10 years worth of basketball stars — like the back of your hand — but they are in the position to show the fans one of the most exciting years ever in K-State baseball.

Most people have little nicknames or words they are called, and for people that spend over three hours together playing baseball everyday, you are bound to learn them or make one up.

I thought I might give the students the chance to learn these nicknames to have a more personal flavor the next time you support Wildcat baseball.

Now for the starting lineup at Arkansas, plus a few extra ever-important pitchers.

■ Catcher: "Chubber." Jeff Ryan fills this slot. His nickname was given to him by his mother during his childhood, when he might not have had the form of a catcher, but instead a beach ball.

■ First Base: "Bean." Chris Hmielewski earned his name in little league, when he looked like a beanstalk on the playing field compared to the other players.

■ Second Base: "Do-Do." Van Torian, who is a newcomer to K-State this season, said his nickname came from his father when he was little league. Hope this name wasn't how you played in little league! Before Tuesday, Torian did not have a nickname at K-State. Sorry Van.

■ Shortstop: "Willie." Craig Wilson's nickname is quite obvious. But if he can be as much as an asset to K-State as Willie Wilson was to Kansas City, then the name might have a different meaning. Wilson is listed as seventh-best collegiate shortstop in America, and the second best professional prospect in the Big Eight.

■ Third Base: "Ripp." This nickname obviously belongs to Brad Rippelmeyer, who has not yet had the privilege of owning a disgusting or humorous nickname. I hope your teammates don't dig up anything too deep on you this season.

■ Leftfield: "Bufon Don." Brian Culp received this nickname for his haircut, which resembles the form of a surfing wave more than a hairstyle befitting an outfielder. Culp earned honorable-mention last year as a freshman.

■ Centerfield: "Skipper." Blair Hanneman said his nickname started one night when he was only a freshman at K-State, and has just stuck ever since. As for the story behind it, he laughed and said he didn't know.

■ Rightfield: "Rat." Scott Stroth. His teammates gave him this name because they said he closely resembles a little rat.

■ Pitchers: "Gloppa Duk" and "Stinky D." Sean Pedersen and Dave Christensen earned these nicknames from their teammates. Their teammates only had to say that these names speak for themselves.

I apologize for any nickname that might cause you a little embarrassment, but I only published them after your teammates told me the names and the stories.

Hurlin' the pea

Wildcat freshman pitcher Brian Hierholzer throws during K-State's baseball practice Tuesday afternoon at Frank Myers Field. The Wildcats open the spring season this weekend with a pair of games against nationally-ranked Arkansas.

Jayhawks rally, down Missouri

Williams blasts KU players after lackluster opening half

By the Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Kansas coach Roy Williams happened upon the perfect solution for an 11th-ranked team playing one of its shabbiest halves in years.

"I embarrassed them," Williams said after Kansas rallied from a nine-point halftime deficit Tuesday night to beat Missouri 74-70.

With almost 7 minutes left in the ragged first half, Williams took out his starters and put in the reserves, who actually shaved one point off Missouri's lead.

But after hitting only 27 percent in the first half and missing 6 of 14 free throws, the Jayhawks (18-4, 7-2) got straightened out to record their ninth victory in a row and solidify their hold on the Big Eight lead.

The Jayhawks went into the game leading the nation with a .561 field goal percentage, but sitting out the final minutes of the first half had the desired affect, center Mark Randall said.

"I'm not sure what was the matter with us, but coach is right, we were embarrassed," he said. "I'm glad he did it." It sure got everybody thinking. We just didn't have our head in the game, and we can't afford to do that."

The Tigers failed to take advantage of Kansas' cold spell by hitting only 11 of 24 from the free throw line. For the game, Missouri was 21 of 36 from the line.

"I think there were a lot of turnovers but turnovers didn't kill us," Missouri center Doug Smith said. "Free throw shooting — I think that was the biggest key in the ballgame."

"The ballgame for us was probably lost in the first half when we made 11 of 24 from the free throw line," Missouri coach Norm Stewart said. "It was a team effort with everybody who walked to that line."

Smith, Missouri's 6-10 Big Eight player of the year last season, muscled underneath for a layup with 45 seconds remaining that drew the Tigers to 69-67. But Terry Brown, who led the Jayhawks with 18 points, then sank a free throw and was fouled by Anthony Peeler a few seconds later after Melvin Booker and Jeff Frost both missed from 3-point range.

Brown made both foul shots with 28 seconds to go, then Mike Maddox canned one and Alonzo Jamison added another to seal the victory and give Kansas a season-sweep of the Tigers.

Jamison had 11 points for the Jayhawks and Randall, who had scored 83 points in the four previous games, had 10.

Smith led Missouri with 23 points and Peeler had 16.

Kansas' lead reached its highest point at 61-53 when Richard Scott canned a short jumper with 3:34 remaining. But then Jamal Coleman drove in and hit a layup and converted a free throw to make it 61-56 with 3:23 left and, after some furious action beneath the basket, Smith hit a bucket to make it 63-58.

Then Booker's free throw and Smith's off-balance jumper closed it to 63-61, but that was as close as the Tigers could get.

NCAA officials enter Syracuse investigation

By the Associated Press

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — A special investigator for the NCAA has questioned former Orangemen Matt Roe about alleged wrongdoings at Syracuse University, a University of Maryland official and Roe's mother confirmed Tuesday.

It is the first indication that college athletics' governing body has entered into the probe of the nationally ranked Syracuse men's basketball program.

The university began an internal investigation last month after a series of articles in December by the Syracuse Post-Standard, which reported players received merchandise, cut-rate use of cars and even cash gifts from boosters, and the program broke recruiting rules.

The questioning of Roe by Hale McMenamin, one of the original NCAA investigators involved in the probe of the UNLV program 13 years ago, was conducted two weeks ago at the University of Maryland, where Roe transferred after the 1988-1989 season, Maryland athletic director Andy Geiger said.

"The NCAA did go down and talk to Matt about Syracuse," Alexandra Roe said. "What they asked him, he didn't say. He was pretty nervous about it, but McMenamin made him feel comfortable. He has nothing to feel guilty about."

"Obviously, you know we're doing some interviews," McMenamin told the newspaper.

Jim Marchiony, a spokesman for the NCAA, confirmed that McMenamin is a part-time member of the NCAA's enforcement staff.

"I can't confirm who he's talked to," Marchiony said. "But just because he's talked to someone about Syracuse doesn't mean an investigation is going on. We talk to a lot of different people to determine whether we're going to do an investigation."

Marchiony said its common procedure for the NCAA to conduct inquiries before determining whether a full-blown investigation is needed.

In other developments Tuesday, Hill said the university still had not received an official resignation from top booster Joseph Giannuzzi, the president of the Hardwood Club who was disassociated from the university as a result of its ongoing investigation.

Giannuzzi was asked to resign Monday because it was in the best interest of the university.

Sports Briefly

Players reach agreements

NEW YORK (AP) — Glenn Davis and Kelly Gruber joined the $3 million club on Tuesday as nine players in salary arbitration agreed to new contracts.

Davis and Baltimore settled at $3,275,000, the midpoint between the first baseman's request and the Orioles' offer. Gruber became the top-paid third baseman in baseball when the Toronto Blue Jays agreed to an $11 million, three-year deal.

That makes it 36 players at or above the $3-million mark, a level first breached by in November 1989 by Minnesota Twins outfielder Kirby Puckett.

St. Louis Cardinals infielder Jose Oquendo agreed to a four-year, $8.5 million extension through 1995. The Cardinals also signed free-agent catcher Rich Gedman to a minor-league contract.

Thirty-seven players remain in salary arbitration.

Wefald applauds speech freedoms

SUZANNE BROWN
Staff Reporter

K-State is facing some issues of great importance. These issues range from the Persian Gulf War to the budget process that will soon occur in the Kansas Legislature.

Last week, President Jon Wefald issued a statement concerning freedom of speech and freedom of assembly.

"The very essence of a university atmosphere depends on its ability to provide for a free and open exchange of ideas and opinions. The truth is, a university community has to maintain and champion the age-old American principles of freedom of speech and freedom of assembly," Wefald said in a written statement.

In the statement Wefald "applauds the commitment of students, faculty and staff to ensure the rights of all to express their views on the issues, no matter how emotional the subject."

"The ideas are timeless. It is important from time to time to remind the University community of them," he said.

Wefald said there was no particular reason for making the statement when he did.

"There is not any right time, it just unfolded. There is always some topic that needs to recognize freedom of speech and freedom of opinion."

Wefald said he believes freedom of speech in the classroom is important for the faculty members and the student. He did say, however, there is a fine line that exists.

"It is important instructors and faculty cover what is to be covered in class. But, faculty have the same freedom of speech in class as well as outside of class," Wefald said.

"Students have every right to agree or disagree with an instructor. It is given to them in the basic Bill of Rights."

He said he believes at K-State there is a strong balance of free exchange of ideas in the classroom.

Phillip Anderson, instructor of speech, said he feels freedom of speech is essential in the classroom.

"It is very important that all the views are heard. I hope that people who disagree with my viewpoint feel they can share their own."

Anderson said he does not believe any limitations should be imposed upon freedom of speech in the classroom.

"Even the most outrageous opinions should be heard," he said.

Students have also said they feel freedom of speech in the classroom is very important.

"It's very important, because you see different ideas, and usually in the classroom it's pretty contained," said Deborah Seibold, senior in political science and pre-law.

"I've had very objective professors. You look up to them and they influence you a lot," she said. "I think the only line that can be drawn is if they are getting away from teaching the facts. As a focus of our attention, they shouldn't twist the facts."

Kevin Needham, junior in mechanical engineering, said, "I think that any attempt to limit the free exchange of ideas would defeat the purpose of the University. That is the charge of the University; one of its most basic functions. I once heard that the foundation of democracy is that the majority rules, but the minority is

Guitarist music diverse, innovative

Talented DeGrassis's album tribute to acoustic sound

REBECCA SACK
Collegian Reviewer

Alex De Grassi's new album, "Deep at Night," is a tribute to the acoustic guitar. De Grassi's talent as a musician is evident in his ability to allow the guitar to express the music in his mind.

De Grassi combines traditions of jazz, folk, classical guitar, pop and cross-cultural music. He adds his own sound to these elements to create music which, like most of Windham Hill's recordings, finds no home in a category.

"Deep at Night," the title track on the album, best exemplifies De Grassi's diversified music. This song includes elements of the entire album and may very well be the album's best representative.

The two best songs on the album, "Indian Summer," and "Arcos," are most memorable for the incredible feats of beauty and softness they attain. De Grassi's composition is on a level with the classical composers. The simplicity of the songs' explorations and expressions combine with the wonder of the intricate execution of the melody lines.

"Indian Summer" evokes romantic pictures of a very real world and lulls the listener into a sort of waking sleep. The song discovers an essential beauty in unexplainable emotion, and yet it creates pictures of contentment. We sense the rhythm of the song beneath the melody line, which stands out as a different instrument.

Reviewer says ...

"A tribute to the guitar"

"Arcos" contains some of these same elements while exploring a certain set of sounds over and over again. The repetition is a sort of uncovering of newness while basking in the purely aesthetic joys of the music. The title of this piece also illustrates De Grassi's aim at creating new types of sounds from the same instrument, just as other string instruments can be either plucked or played with a bow.

Songs like, "Blue Trout," "The Mirror," and "Hidden Voices" show us the influence of new acoustic music on De Grassi's style. He creates innovative sounds with dissonance and odd juxtapositions of sound and rhythm.

In "Hidden Voices," De Grassi creates a distinctive melody line over a current of pulsating energy. The song engages the listener in a long wait for a resolution, without losing any anticipation. Finally, after a short silence, a series of harmonic chords solve the music for the moment. Then it begins again, the same pulse repeating with a more positive expectancy until the song reaches its second climax to a resolution of soft arpeggios. De Grassi's music finds communication with every part of the person — mind, body and spirit.

Mardi Gras festival unhindered, colored by war

By the Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Traditional Mardi Gras drunkenness and breast-baring irreverence exploded on New Orleans streets Tuesday, colored this year with extra doses of flamboyant wartime patriotism.

Effigies and caricatures of Saddam Hussein hung from oak trees and lamp posts. Among the usual scantily clad men and women lining the streets were dozens of Statues of Liberty, Betsy Rosses and make-believe soldiers.

"You can forget about the war for a little while, especially today," said tourist Donna Crowe, 27, dressed as Miss Liberty. "But it will be back before long."

The Evansville, Ind., medical technician said the daughter of one of her co-workers is just 40 miles from the front lines in Saudi Arabia.

Parade-goers camped out overnight along parade routes to stake out territory, setting up tents and barbecue grills. They wanted to be in position to catch beads and other junk tossed by maskers on the hundreds of floats in successive parades on Mardi Gras — French for Fat Tuesday, the day before Lent begins.

Parades included the procession of Rex, King of Carnival and head of a secretive "krewe" of high society, old-money businessmen. Also rolling was the all-black Zulu Social Aid and Pleasure Club, which started 75 years ago as a spoof of the more staid, all-white krewes.

In between traditional krewes rolled the truck parades, in which any group with a decorated flatbed truck and a few hundred dollars for an entry fee could join.

Parodies of Iraqi dress were the costume of choice for many. Andre McDonald, 42, of New Orleans donned Arab robes and called himself Abdullah the Absent.

"I wish I could be with my people in the desert," he joked, "but there's shooting going on there, and there's drinking going on here."

The raunchier side of the celebration unfolded in the French Quarter, where cross-dressers, roamed the streets with abandon and women bared breasts in return for Mardi Gras trinkets.

There had been talk of canceling Carnival parades when the Persian Gulf War broke out last month, but city officials said that would be economic suicide in a city still suffering the effects of the mid-'80s oil bust. Officials estimated that Mardi Gras would pump some $480 million into the local economy this year.

Various estimates put the crowds at about 1 million, although there had been speculation that terrorism fears and the recession might reduce the attendance. Hotel bookings were down to 91 percent from about 98 percent going into the final weekend of Carnival.

Still, the crowds standing a dozen deep along St. Charles Avenue parade routes appeared as large and as festive as ever.

Police said they had an anti-terrorism plan in effect. They refused to discuss it.

New bill to stop censorship at high school newspapers

ERIN BURKE
Collegian Reporter

High school newspapers may soon be freed from administrative censorship if a bill introduced into the Kansas Senate is eventually signed into law.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said Senate Bill 62 was specifically introduced for that purpose.

"People have rights no matter what their age," she said.

The bill is response to a case in Missouri in which high school students took the administration to court because a controversial issue had been censored. The case was eventually decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in favor of the administration, she said. That ruling gave high school administrators the right to censor controversial issues in school newspapers.

A hearing on the bill was held Thursday, Oleen said. Students from Dodge City, Council Grove and other Kansas towns testified for the bill at the hearing.

Penny Wika, journalism teacher at Manhattan High School, said students should be able to print controversial subjects.

"I think it's wrong when schools only allow the good things to be printed," she said.

This is her sixth year as a journalism instructor, and she said she has not had problems with censorship.

"I just wish every school district had an understanding administration like we have at Manhattan," she said.

The administration is not only supportive, but encourages students to cover controversial issues, Wika said.

By restricting students in journalism, the education of the students suffers, Oleen said.

"The responsibility is up to the individual writers, not the school district," she said.

Eweleen Rhue, journalism instructor at Pittsburg High School, said censorship is often the case with controversial issues for the school paper.

"The administration doesn't call it censorship, they call it 'concerned about the school,'" she said.

Editing and censorship are very similar processes, but editing makes stories accurate while censoring allows for personal opinion, Rhue said.

Rhue has been a journalism instructor for six years and has dealt with three different principals. Each one censored the paper, not out of fears of inaccuracy but because the administration did not want to offend a committee or community member, she said.

The bill sends a clear message that students are responsible, Oleen said.

Nutrition class offered

Improving eating behavior healthier than going on diet

CINDY BRIGGS
Collegian Reporter

Emphasizing good nutrition, regular exercise and improved eating behavior is what Martha Ann Olson, registered dietician at Lafene Health Center, said the Weight Management class is all about.

"We are not on a diet," she said. "We are learning weight control by good-sense eating."

The classes, held at Lafene once a week in two separate sessions, are for overweight individuals who wish to decrease their weight to a more ideal level, Olson said. Classmates provide group support for one another through discussion of individual problems or successes.

"The class itself is a peer reinforcement," Olson said.

Each week the students complete a food diary to keep track of the foods they eat and when they eat them. The diary allows Olson to supervise her students' nutritional needs as well as point out any eating patterns that need to be changed. Besides the diary, students weigh in each week to monitor any changes.

A presentation by Dina Darling, senior in nutrition exercise science and student intern, informs the students on weight-control topics such as the consumption of fat in the diet.

The class itself is a peer reinforcement.

—Martha Ann Olson
Lafene Health Center
registered dietician

Both Olson and Darling agree managing weight begins with learning to pick the right foods in moderation. Olson said once a person is able to choose nutritional foods, establish a weekly exercise program and recognize eating behavior that needs changing, he or she should be able to lose two pounds a week.

Although the emphasis of the class is not to lose weight, Olson said it occurs naturally while on the program along with the mental aspect of feeling good about oneself.

"If we can get them on a sound nutrition and exercise program, they feel even better about themselves," she said.

Olson said she doesn't rely on weight charts to determine what an individual should weigh. Factors such as individual body structure and family inheritance interfere with the charts.

Many people blame heredity for their weight problems, but Olson said heredity only determines what may be a person's body shape. It's an individual's environment that contributes to an individual's weight.

Throughout the 10 years of the class, Olson said she has noticed college students are more aware of nutrition and its importance for wellness. She also said with the higher legal drinking age there has been less weight gain due to beer.

Students are welcome to schedule an appointment with Olson to discuss eating disorders, cholesterol levels, ulcers, hyperglycemia or any other health problems related to nutrition.

If you thought that finding a color Macintosh® system you could afford was just a dream, then the new, affordable Macintosh LC is a dream come true.

The Macintosh LC is rich in color. Unlike many computers that can display only 16 colors at once, the Macintosh LC expands your palette to 256 colors. It also comes with a microphone and new sound-input technology that lets you personalize your work by adding voice or other sounds.

Like every Macintosh computer, the LC is easy to set up and easy to master. And it runs thousands of available applications that all work in the same, consistent way—so once you've learned one program, you're well on your way to learning them all. The Macintosh LC even lets you share information with someone who uses a different type of computer—thanks to the versatile Apple® SuperDrive™, which can read from and write to Macintosh, MS-DOS, OS/2, and Apple II floppy disks.

Take a look at the Macintosh LC and see what it gives you. Then pinch yourself.

Free tutoring gives students extra help

MELISSA SMITH
Collegian Reporter

If you have ever had problems in any of your classes, you are not alone — over 700 K-State students received tutoring from Educational Supportive Services in Holton Hall last fall.

"Educational Supportive Services offers a tutoring program for the entire University," Charlotte Olsen, academic services coordinator, said.

The program initially began in 1972 with a federal grant, said Anne Butler, director of the services, but the tutoring was limited to students who were classified as low-income, first-generation or physically handicapped.

In 1989, it received funding from the Student Governing Association through the Educational Opportunity Fund and began its present service of University-wide tutoring, she said.

The number of students taking advantage of the tutoring has steadily increased, Butler said, from 552 students in the fall of 1989 to over 700 last fall.

Olsen said the program concentrates primarily on students who are enrolled in undergraduate courses, although it is not restricted to those students.

The program provides help in math, modern languages, accounting and other business courses, biology, chemistry, sociology, psychology, engineering courses and more.

"We cover a really wide area of subjects," she said.

Students who want to be tutored need to fill out the appropriate paperwork, and then they are assigned, using a computer program, to a small group tutoring session.

The sessions usually have one to five people, and the student can request tutoring in that subject up to three times a week.

"The small group tutoring sessions are set up to encourage cooperative learning as well as provide students with skills in developing the right questions to ask," Butler said.

Cooperative learning occurs when the students facilitate each other's learning by helping one another, she said.

"Our expectation of the students when they do sign up for tutoring is that they will come to all the tutoring sessions," Olsen said.

She said the program helps students improve their study skills, not just learn material before a test.

"We are interested in helping a student not just in putting out a fire prior to a test but with study skills and learning skills," she said.

If a subject is not offered at a time when the student is available, the program provides walk-in help sessions in several different subjects.

The type of students who request tutoring range from those who need long-term academic support to those who may just have a few questions now and then, Olsen said.

Regardless of which type of tutoring a student needs, the service is free.

The service hires students to serve as part-time tutors, she said, and then provides an intensive training program.

There are currently about 45 tutors.

In the program, the tutors find out about learning theories and styles, how to relate to diverse audiences and how to tutor, she said.

During the fall, tutors also took a two-hour course to continue the training, she said, but this spring the training will be less intense since most of the tutors are returning.

When a student applies to be a tutor, the service asks for faculty members as references to make sure that the student would be acceptable by the faculty of the subject in which the student would be tutoring.

She said they also sometimes ask personnel in various departments to help with the training sessions.

Brenda Grey, senior in math and secondary education, has been a tutor for five semesters.

The tutors build up the students' confidence to make them believe they can do it, she said.

Oscar nominations released

Warner Bros. may sweep nominations again this year, get boost at box office

By the Associated Press

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Warner Bros., which used Oscar nominations to jump-start "Driving Miss Daisy" at the box office, is hoping to do the same with "GoodFellas," a film that wowed the critics but not the public.

"GoodFellas" stood to collect several top selections with the announcement of nominations for the 63rd Academy Awards in a pre-dawn ceremony today.

The best actor favorites were Kevin Costner in his western "Dances With Wolves" and Al Pacino for his work in "The Godfather Part III." Actresses who received other awards going into the Oscar nominations included Anjelica Huston for "The Grifters" and Joanne Woodward for "Mr. and Mrs. Bridge."

A year ago, Warner Bros. trumpeted the leading nine nominations "Driving Miss Daisy" collected.

"Driving Miss Daisy" went on to make $107 million. This year, the studio is banking on its acclaimed mobster movie, "GoodFellas."

By Friday newspaper, television and radio advertisements will be packed with advertisements ballyhooing their nominations.

Analysts figure nominations can boost a film's theatrical fortunes by at least $10 million. Oscar triumphs in top categories can be worth twice that.

Martin Scorsese's "GoodFellas" has won major awards from the National Society of Film Critics and film critic organizations in New York, Los Angeles and Boston.

Based on the book by Nicholas Pileggi, "GoodFellas" also dominated many critics' Top 10 year-end lists.

"GoodFellas" starring Robert De Niro, Ray Liotta and Joe Pesci has produced a little more than $40 million in ticket sales.

Warner Bros. will re-release the film on about 1,000 screens on Friday. The approach is a little risky if "GoodFellas" disappoints the studio prophets.

Warner Bros. and other film producers bombarded the more than 4,800 voting members of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences with videotapes, promotions and gifts hoping to draw votes.

"We would ask each individual Academy member to be on guard against inappropriate attempts to influence your vote, and to register your displeasure with anyone who might make such an attempt," the Academy said in a note to members with this year's list of 223 feature-length eligible films.

Each of the Academy's branches votes for its peers. Actors nominate actors, directors nominate directors, and so on. All members vote for best picture.

There are up to five nominations in each of 17 major categories. Specialized nominating procedures are used for foreign-language films, documentaries and short subjects are also subject to committee vote.

Technical Oscars will be presented to winners selected by the Academy's Board of Governors acting on committee recommendations.

Hospital merger not near

Idea to join St. Mary and Memorial three decades old

MARLA ROCKHOLD
Collegian Reporter

For about three decades, there have been several attempts to merge Manhattan's Memorial Hospital and the Saint Mary Hospital.

Merger attempts started shortly after the Saint Mary Hospital was built in 1961, Mike Nunamaker, administrator and CEO for Memorial, said.

"The first time an attempt was made to merge was in 1962," he said. Nunamaker said the attempts were motivated by the desire to provide the best possible health care.

"We could provide those services we had been providing, but in an improved manner and provide previously unavailable services."

Although Nunamaker said a merger would not automatically reduce health care cost, reducing those prices were a goal in a merger. Costs may be reduced in the long run because there would be fewer facilities to manage.

Nunamaker said it was not for a lack of effort by both hospitals that the merge attempts were unsuccessful.

"It is a very complex matter," he said. "There must be certain things in place for a successful merger.

"They (mergers) start for all the right reasons — providing better services. But on one side or another, the right decision makers weren't involved in the process at the right times."

"Both parties must be willing to give up some identity, and neither side was willing to throw in their name and philosophy," he said.

The issue of governance also posed a problem, Nunamaker said.

"The owners must be able to form a new board, which will involve assets of each hospital," he said.

The Memorial Hospital is controlled by a board of community members. The building is owned by the county, Nunamaker said.

The Saint Mary Hospital is owned by the CST Health System, said Mark Brown-Barnett, chief executive officer of Saint Mary. It is a corporation that is a part of the Sisters of Saint Joseph in Wichita.

Brown-Barnett gave another reason for the unsuccessful merge attempts — an agreement between the hospitals and the Federal Trade Commission.

In the agreement, Saint Mary provides emergency room services, and Memorial provides obstetric services. Brown-Barnett said neither hospital could break this agreement.

As of now, there are not any plans for another merge attempt, Nunamaker said. Each hospital is upgrading its own facilities and services.

Nunamaker said Memorial Hospital has always been known for its strong obstetric services, and the Saint Mary Hospital is known for its emergency room services.

Nunamaker said Memorial has this image because most local women went there to have babies, and it did not have an emergency room until 1985. They are now trying to educate the public about their capabilities to provide emergency room care.

"The primary strengths (of Saint Mary Hospital) are in acute care, the intensive care unit, a strong emergency room and quality nursing care," Brown-Barnett said. "Many of our nurses have beyond the required education."

Brown-Barnett said as each hospital upgrades its services, there is some duplication, which may increase costs. For example, both hospitals recently purchased a $600,000 to $700,000 piece of equipment.

Even though there is duplication and costs are sometimes high, Brown-Barnett said there is enough business to support both hospitals.

The area served by the two hospitals covers a large population.

"There is a primary service area of about 45,000 to 50,000 people, and a secondary service area of 100,000 to 150,000 people," Brown-Barnett said.

Nunamaker said he feels there are good things about having two hospitals and duplicating services.

"Competition makes us keep our prices in line and makes health care stay state-of-the-art," he said.

Although there is competition between the hospitals, there is good communication, Nunamaker said.

Nunamaker said he believes there will eventually be just one hospital in Manhattan.

"I would say a merger is in the future," Brown-Barnett agreed. "But not as long as the county continues to give Memorial money."

Even though there are many complex reasons the two hospitals have not merged, Nunamaker said having two hospitals in Manhattan is simply what some people like.

"American people are used to having a choice in health care."

Chinese activists jailed for sedition

By the Associated Press

BEIJING — Two longtime democracy activists were sentenced Tuesday to 13 years in prison, apparently receiving the most severe punishment yet stemming from the 1989 Tiananmen Square protests.

The court gave a six-year sentence to a third man convicted of sedition and released a fourth who it said was guilty but repented.

Wang Juntao, a 33-year-old newspaper editor, and Chen Ziming, 38, the head of a private social science research institute, received the 13-year prison terms after being convicted of sedition.

Robin Munro, a researcher for the human rights group Asia Watch, said authorities were seeking to make the two the scapegoats for the 1989 democracy movement, which drew millions of protesters into the streets of cities nationwide.

"They said there was a conspiracy. By their own logic they had to produce scapegoats and conspirators," Munro said in a telephone interview from his Hong Kong office.

Sources close to the two men's families said Chen asked the court to investigate alleged tampering with documents and tapes used against him, but his petition was turned down.

They said the judges in both trials also refused to let the defense attorneys present new information that showed their clients' innocence, and repeatedly interrupted Chen and Wang when they tried to defend themselves.

Asked about the sentences, State Department spokeswoman Margaret Tutwiler said the administration finds them deeply troubling.

"No prison sentence imposed for non-violent activity could be considered lenient," she said.

"The speed of the verdicts, the limited opportunity afforded defendants to prepare a defense and the inability of independent observers to attend the trials inevitably raises questions of justice, fairness and due process."

The sentences were revealed one hour after the court finished hearing evidence in Wang's case and less than an hour after it finished hearing Chen's.

"Obviously the sentences had already been decided," a friend of the two activists said on condition of anonymity. He said relatives of the two men who attended the sentencing reported that they stood calmly.

He said Chen, who was thin and weak from a recent three-day hunger strike, smiled slightly. Neither man was allowed to speak to the relatives who attended.

Liu Gang, 30, a researcher at Chen's institute who helped organize student protesters, was given a six-year term because he acknowledged his crimes and showed willingness to repent, The Xinhua news agency said.

Chen Xiaoping, a 29-year-old law lecturer who had ties to the institute, was convicted of sedition but released because he surrendered and showed repentance, Xinhua said. The two Chens are not related.

As in previous sentences, the government combined heavy and light terms in an apparent effort to blunt criticism.

The government regarded Wang, Liu and the Chens as the most serious offenders of several dozen leading protesters tried recently. Many of the others played more public roles but were given lesser terms, such as student leader Wang Dan, who was sentenced to four years.

Faculty Senate discusses promotions, salary

DAN SCOTT
Staff Reporter

Faculty Senate discussed technical problems dealing with promotion increments and salary compression in its meeting Tuesday.

Under the present system, faculty members are given salary promotions based on a percentage of available monies, said Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald. In different years, a different amount will be available. At times, this can work to a professor's disadvantage. For instance, if $7,000 is available for promotions one year, the department head may give $1,000 to an associate professor being promoted to a full professor. If less money is available the next year, a person receiving the same promotion would receive less money.

"Then we would have people with the same rank earning much different salaries," Reagan said.

By using a fixed promotion increment, the disparaging salaries could be equalized, Reagan said. Faculty members would receive a set sum for their promotion.

In a letter to Wefald dated Feb. 11,

Provost James Coffman said the money would come from the annual adjustment pool. In years of no adjustment pool, the base budget would provide the money.

Salary compression is another problem faculty members must face, Reagan said. This condition results when the salary difference between differently ranked professors decreases.

To correct for salary compression, Reagan said promotions would be given to faculty members based on merit. Thus, the instructors receiving the promotions would most likely be the ones moving up in rank.

The compression issue will have to be dealt with once or twice before the effects will be felt, Reagan said. The promotion increment will be used every year to prevent another salary compression.

Reagan said he would like to see the measures implemented by July, the start of the next fiscal year.

Ad Hoc council faces deadline

CHRISSY VENDEL
Collegian Reporter

A committee looking into providing Student Publications Inc. with an increase in student fees to help it overcome financial difficulties faces a deadline imposed by the Kansas Board of Regents.

The Student Publications Ad Hoc Committee met Tuesday to discuss the financial standing of Student Publications, and will meet again Thursday to make a final report. Student Publications prints the Campus Directory, the Royal Purple yearbook and the Kansas State Collegian daily newspaper.

The report will outline a fee increase proposal and the representation of the Student Publications board.

The committee consists of five senators, two at-large committee members, two administrators and one person from the Board of Student Publications.

Not everyone could make it to the Tuesday meeting, including the chairman, which could delay the report.

Travis Stumpff, senior in political science and chairman of the committee, said a report needs to be turned in Thursday by midnight so it may be passed on to the Student Affairs and Social Services Standing Committee.

"Thursday's meeting is open so anyone interested in the proposals may attend," Stumpff said.

The Student Affairs committee will examine the report and decide whether it will go to Student Senate for consideration.

Brooke Jones, junior in journalism and chairwoman of the Student Affairs committee, said she is undecided on any proposal.

"Until I see the report I am keeping an open mind," she said.

If the Student Affairs committee approves the report, they will write it into a bill to be presented to the Student Senate, Stumpff said.

"It will probably take Student Affairs two meetings to do anything with the report," he said.

Student Senate will take two weeks to decide whether to approve any proposal passed on to them by the Student Affairs Committee, he said. It would go before the regents. The regents have set a March 15 deadline for proposals to be put on their calendar.

Todd Heitschmidt, student body president, said he was going to the regents today to see if they would give a deadline extension to create a better time factor.

"We have a lot of informing of the student body to do," he said. "We don't want to push this through too quickly."

"If the extension isn't granted, we might not get to look at some things as closely," Heitschmidt said, "and we might not get the best legislation we could get."

Bridges speaks for Black History Month

MEREDITH JONES
Collegian Reporter

"The Negro has been taught to admire the Greek, has been taught to admire the Hebrew, has been taught to admire the Latin, but has been taught to despise the African."

Bruce Bridges, a historian and educator from Durham, N.C., said Tuesday to about 200 people in the Union Little Theatre as part of Black History Month. He spoke about the contributions Africans and African-Americans have had on world civilization that history has left out.

"It's hard discussing the longest living people on the Earth in the shortest month of the year," Bridges said of the Black History Month falling in February. "History is all around and it's important that we realize these contributions other than only in February."

Bridges spoke of Dr. Carter Woodson, the father of Black History Month and the second black to receive a Ph.D. from Harvard University.

"It took 30 years to get rid of my Western training."

Bridges spoke of the contributions Africans made that were credited to Europeans. He said history has become Euro-centricized.

Egypt, a part of Africa started by Ethiopians, used to be called Khem, where chemistry was first studied.

Mythology started in Egypt, although many think it started in Greece because it is now known as Greek mythology, he said.

Egyptians also showed they knew the Pythagorean theory and about math and science even before it was developed by their precise pyramids.

Man originated in Africa and then spread to other parts of the world, Bridges said.

Bridges also spoke of Marcus Garvey, a black American leader from Jamaica. Garvey said about black men, "You were great in the past and you shall again be great. Be courageous, have faith and always go forward."

Disney offers employment Representatives speak with 250 students about program

ARLOAH FAIRCHILD
Collegian Reporter

Rusty Spears and Karen Besenyodi, College and International Relations representatives from Walt Disney World, tried to convince 250 students to spend their summer with Mickey Mouse at an information meeting Tuesday.

"Walt Disney World's college program has been coming to K-State for the last six years," Pat Pesci, director of Hotel Restaurant Management, said. "We've had very positive results with the program."

The Walt Disney World representatives will interview students for positions Wednesday in Holtz Hall. Besenyodi said students majoring in business, hospitality, communications, recreation and drama/theater are allowed to interview.

The college program started in 1981 with only 250 students and now has 2,600 workers.

The worker, who is called a cast member, works a minimum of 30 hours a week and is paid $5.30 per hour, Besenyodi said.

Besenyodi said it is hard work, but also a great experience. The cast member works five days and gets two consecutive days off.

Spears said cast members live in an apartment complex, Vista Way, while working at Walt Disney World.

Transportation to and from work is furnished, but Spears said if you can talk your parents in to letting you bring a car it is much better and you can make friends faster.

The Vista Way apartment complex is complete with swimming pools, tennis courts, weight rooms, jacuzzi, racquetball courts and furnished apartments. The cast members chose to live in either a two- or three-bedroom apartment, Spears said.

A strict dress code is followed by cast members, Spears said, because of the all-American look that Walt Disney World is trying to portray.

At the seminars, ladies are supposed to wear dresses or skirts and blouses, and only one pair of earrings that are no larger than the size of a penny. The shoes are to have a one-inch defined heel, and little make-up is worn. No eyeshadow is allowed and hose are a natural color, Spears said.

"It is a good experience," Kim Jones, business administration pre-professional and college program alumni, said. "I met a lot of people and made a lot of friends."

New bill to offer car tax relief

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — Five Democratic lawmakers introduced a bill in the Senate Tuesday they believe would distribute property tax relief equitably across the state.

They want to eliminate the tax on motor vehicles.

"This is immediate and direct property tax relief to a significant number of Kansas taxpayers," said

Sen. Marge Petty of Topeka, who is the principal sponsor of the measure.

"There are many, many property tax relief ideas now before the Legislature, but this is the first one that could provide significant relief directly to taxpayers and the only one dealing with the tax on vehicles," she said.

New car buyers would pay a one-time surcharge of $50 for vehicles weighing less than 4,500 pounds, which covers most cars and some smaller pickups, and $100 for vehicles with a gross weight of more than 4,500 pounds.

The state would provide counties with an amount equal to the motor vehicle taxes collected in 1991, so that county budgets would not have to absorb the cost of the property tax relief, Petty said.

Flora

A wholesale house is where florists purchase various supplies including silk flowers, cut flowers, tape and wire. Kimmins said the wholesale houses hold one day design schools florists attend to get ideas for their own shops.

"Some of the wholesale houses let students buy supplies, so they can come back and try out different designs," Kimmins said.

For the Retail Floriculture club's first fund raiser, it will be host of a Valentine's Day sale.

"There will be 200 arrangements for sale. All colors of carnations and ribbon. We'll also have bud vases with a rose and baby's breath," Johnson said.

The arrangements will cost $5 and the sale will be held in the main lobby of Waters Hall. Sales will be from 1:30 p.m. to 5:30 p.m. Feb. 13 and from 8:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Feb. 14, or until they are sold out.

The flowers for the Valentine's Day fund raiser will be shipped from South America and members of the club will prepare the arrangements, Kimmins said.

Computer

"The first time students may be apprehensive about using LYNX, but afterwards they don't usually have problems with it," Moore said. "You can see more people at the LYNX terminals than using the card catalog now."

Moore said the LYNX system has more capabilities and is faster than the ALIS system.

Those capabilities, Allen said, are available because the software runs in a mainframe environment. Remote access is gained through the academic mainframe.

"Anyone with a computer, some kind of connection such as a modem or data switch and communications software will be able to access the on-line catalog," Allen said.

The catalog can also be accessed through terminals on campus in public computing labs or available to students in residence halls.

Access is made in almost the same way as access to the academic mainframe. Instead of typing in a user ID, the students would type in the name of the catalog LYNX.

Freedom

Wefald said he feels this type of statement should possibly be issued every year.

"The minority viewpoint has every right to be heard and to set up a meeting and articulate their feelings, people just need to be reminded of that."

The last paragraph of the statement says, "However, there have been (a) few reports of group harassment, intimidation and threats against individuals expressing their views. This University and its administration will not tolerate such actions and will do everything within its power to ensure that the rights of each member of our community are protected."

These enforcement policies are hard to determine, and Wefald was unable to predict how harassment or threats would be handled.

"Every situation is different," Wefald said.

Allies bomb shelter; 500 dead

Iraq claims civilians targeted; U.S. says site military bunker

By the Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Rescuers and weeping families dug charred, mutilated bodies from a bomb shelter blasted by allied warplanes Wednesday in a pre-dawn strike.

Authorities said the attack killed at least 500 civilians. If accurate, it would be by far the highest civilian toll reported from any single attack since the Persian Gulf War began four weeks ago.

The United States said the targeted facility was a military bunker used as a command and control facility. No evidence of any military presence could be seen inside the wreckage, and Iraqi authorities denied that any military personnel had been using the facility.

Foreign journalists, including two reporters from the Associated Press, were allowed to inspect the site and were told, for the first time during the war, they could file their reports without censorship.

The attack occurred about 4 a.m. By nightfall rescuers were still working to remove huge chunks of concrete from the 40-foot-deep facility in the al-Amirah district, a middle-class neighborhood.

Smoke still rose from the rubble, and about 5,000 people were gathered nearby, many awaiting word about missing relatives.

At mid-morning more than 40 charred bodies were laid out on the ground at a time as dozens of ambulances shuttled back and forth to morgues.

As reporters watched the decapitated body of a woman was pulled out and laid next to a small torso — apparently that of a girl whose head and limbs were blown off.

Containers of water could be seen in the rubble. Outside the bombed facility was a sign, in English and Arabic, designating the place as a bomb shelter, and loudspeakers which appeared to be used to sound alarms.

One teen-ager, Omar Adnan, said he was the only one in his family to escape alive. He said his three younger sisters, mother and father all died.

In a faint voice, Adnan, 17, said: "I was sleeping and suddenly I felt heat and the blanket was burning. Moments later, I felt I was suffocating. I turned to try and touch my mother who was next to me but grabbed nothing but a piece of flesh."

Residents of the neighborhood crowded the scene, looking for relatives and friends. Men beat on their chests and yelled "Allahu Akbar!" Arabic for "God is Great." Women cried hysterically.

Witnesses said the first missile or bomb hit the entrance of the facility, jamming the only escape route. The second strike, moments later, penetrated the 9-foot-thick concrete roof and exploded inside the windowless shelter, the witnesses said.

A senior civil defense official said there was no hope anyone remained alive.

"There are no survivors there anymore. The fire is melting the metal. There's no way any human being could have survived until now," he said on condition of anonymity.

Health Minister Abdel-Salam Mohammed Saeed told reporters there were 1,000 people inside the shelter, one of five similar structures built during the 1980-88 war against Iran and designed to hold twice that number.

Other officials said 400-500 people had moved into the facility since the allied bombing began Jan. 17. Because allied attacks were particularly intense Tuesday and Wednesday, many more people sought refuge in the fortified structure overnight, the officials said.

Eight survivors were taken to nearby Yarmuk Hospital, and only two of them appeared conscious. All suffered burns.

Air strike tragedy may pressure Bush into activating ground troops in gulf

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The mounting death toll of innocent civilians in Iraq threatens the solidarity of the international alliance against Saddam Hussein and could intensify pressure on President Bush to move swiftly toward a decisive ground war.

Bush's predicament was worsened Wednesday by news that perhaps 500 people were killed in an allied air strike on an underground structure in Baghdad. The administration called the structure a military command center and said it was uncertain why civilians were there.

The grisly news footage of charred bodies and wailing survivors suddenly gave a hard reality to what the administration had been trying to dismiss as merely an Iraqi propaganda and public relations battle.

For days, the White House had been arguing that civilian casualties were far lower than claimed by Saddam Hussein, and Iraq was trying to exploit the unfortunate but inevitable civilian losses.

With confirmation of many civilian deaths, the administration quickly shifted tactics to put the blame on Saddam rather than continue to debate who was winning the public relations contest.

The White House reminded Americans that Saddam used hostages last year as human shields at strategic sites and now claims to have placed prisoners of war at military facilities that might be bombed by the allies. The administration said two MiG-21s were parked near the front door of a treasured archeological site in the ancient city of Ur.

Iraq's Scud missile attacks have been aimed at civilian centers in Israel and Saudi Arabia.

Mandela witnesses refuse to testify

By the Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Two key state witnesses said they feared reprisals and refused Wednesday to testify against Winnie Mandela, dealing a severe blow to the prosecution's case.

Kenneth Kgase and Tabiso Mono appeared in the Rand Supreme Court but their refusal to give evidence left the state without its main witnesses in the trial against Winnie Mandela, wife of African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela.

She and three others have been charged with four counts each of kidnapping and assault.

Prosecutor Jan Swanepoel said the state's case was based on the testimony of Kgase, Mono and Gabriel Mekgwe, three of the four young men allegedly abducted and beaten at Mrs. Mandela's Soweto home in December 1988. The fourth, 14-year-old Stompie Seipei, was found dead in a field a week later.

Mekgwe disappeared Sunday. Swanepoel said he was kidnapped, and Kgase and Mono said they fear for their own lives.

The South African Press Association, meanwhile, reported that a man claiming to be Mekgwe called the news agency Wednesday night and said he was in Harare, Zimbabwe. The caller said he did not feel safe in South Africa, SAPA said.

"I know if you don't want to give evidence in South Africa, you can be detained," he said.

The independent news agency said the man spoke to a reporter familiar with Mekgwe, and the reporter said the caller's voice was similar to the missing witness.

Kgase and Mono could receive up to two years in prison for refusing to testify, but Kgase said he preferred that to possible physical harm.

"I really like my life. I want my life," Kgase said.

The case could damage relations between the ANC and the government as they prepare for negotiations on a new constitution to end white minority rule.

Counties file lawsuit against state

Courts to decide if college students, military personnel counted in districts

JEFF STURDY
Collegian Reporter

A lawsuit is currently in front of state and federal courts in an effort to make the state of Kansas increase the legislative representation of communities like Manhattan.

The cities of Manhattan and Lawrence, along with Riley, Leavenworth and Douglas counties, are suing the state for the practice of not counting college students or military personnel based in those areas as part of their populations in determining legislative districts.

Kansas has an amendment in the state constitution that allows the state to count students and military personnel differently than the United States Census.

"The Census uses the 'snapshot' method of counting people, meaning they count you where you are living at that particular time," Patty Hackney, one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, said.

Kansas is one of the three states that counts military personnel as still having residence in the region they came from, but Kansas is the only state that does not count students in the region in where they attend school, Hackney said.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, said there are nearly 20,000 students and another 20,000 military personnel that would not be counted in Riley County by the state.

Kansas Legislative districts are set up by the state to have an equal population in each district. If the state doesn't count the students and military personnel as part of the population of Riley County, it takes representation away from them, Oleen said.

"In effect, I would be representing nearly 90,000 people where as others would only represent 40,000. Reapportionment hurts us here in Topeka," she said. "If I'm not representing them (students and military personnel), who is?"

"We couldn't get the law changed because there was not enough of us who thought it was unfair. Politically, we couldn't win, so we went to court," Oleen said.

Hackney said the U.S. Census taken in 1980 was old and outdated, so the state used the state census in 1988 to refigure money and representation designated for each district.

The plaintiffs filed suit in November 1988, against the State of Kansas, Secretary of State Bill Graves and then-Gov. Mike Hayden.

"We are challenging the constitutionality of the way the state is counting students and military people," Hackney said. "Another concern is that where people were registered to vote was never taken into account."

Lawrence had more registered voters at one time than the state census showed, Hackney said.

There are three basic parts to the lawsuit, which challenge the constitutionality of state statutes and amendments that determine where students and military personnel are counted and the way the 1988 census was conducted, Hackney said. The suits are before both state and federal courts.
